Katie & Nathaniel

Early Childhood
    The Great Afternoon
        Cartoons Are for Life: The Secret Password & The Afternoon Sanctuary
    Summer Camp at Virginia Dominion University
        The Parallel Pair: Dominion Mall & The VDU Fieldhouse
    Big Family Christmas
        The Newport News Train & The Downstairs Sofa Bed
Middle School & The Blizzard of ’96
    The Blizzard of ’96
        Snow Day in Virginia Beach & The Backyard Promise
    Katie Is Dumped
        No More Fighting & The Dinner Dance Promise
    The Pretend Boyfriend & Twins’ Day
        Twin Brothers Always Stay: Spirit Week & The Living Room Sofa

Early Childhood

The Great Afternoon

Cartoons Are for Life: The Secret Password & The Afternoon Sanctuary

Date: 1994-05-18 at 15:30 America/New_York

> Inside Nathaniel's deep-blue bedroom in Virginia Beach in 1994, eight-year-old fraternal twins Nathaniel and Katie Prairie with matching light platinum-blonde hair sit side by side on the carpeted floor in front of a 1990s CRT television and cable converter box, holding hands and smiling as their favorite afternoon cartoon theme plays

3:30 PM — The Secret Password

At three-thirty on a weekday afternoon, the upstairs hallway of our house in Virginia Beach was supposed to be quiet, and the only way to keep the outside world from following us inside was to lock the perimeter behind a password.

Inside my deep-blue bedroom, I sat cross-legged on the dark low-pile carpet in front of the television stand, watching the red digital clock on the cable converter box tick from `3:28` to `3:29`. At eight years old, I didn't care what the other kids on our street were doing after the school bus dropped us off. School was six straight hours of scraping desks, unpredictable bells, and teachers who tried to seat fraternal twins on opposite sides of the hallway just because I was a boy and Katie was a girl.

By the time our sneakers hit the front porch, both of us needed the exact same reset.

Right on the dot at `3:29`, three polite, measured knocks sounded against the painted wood of my closed bedroom door.

I didn't reach for the brass doorknob yet. I stayed right where I was on the carpet, keeping to the rules of our protocol.

"Cartoons are for life," came Katie's voice through the wood, hushed and completely serious.

The secret password was given. Immediately, I scrambled up off the carpet and swung the door open to admit my twin sister just in time for our favorite afternoon block of cartoons. To the teachers at school and the adults in our extended family, I was Nathaniel, though Dad and Katie half the time just called me Nate; behind this door, I was simply the other half of Katie's perimeter.

Katie slipped inside, her long, straight platinum-blonde hair swinging past her shoulders as she pulled the door shut behind her until the latch clicked. We didn't need to explain to anyone else why we had a password for a room ten feet away from her own bedroom down the hall. Out in the rest of the house, the afternoon air was already heavy—Mom had locked her bedroom door at two o'clock with another headache and a glass from the kitchen cabinet, and Dad wouldn't be home from work until five-thirty to start dinner. Behind my closed door, however, the rules belonged entirely to the two of us.

Eight-year-old fraternal twins Nathaniel and Katie Prairie sitting side by side on the bedroom carpet in front of their CRT television and cable converter box during their afternoon cartoon block

I rushed back across the carpet and pressed the power button on the front of the television and the cable converter box just as the studio logo flashed across the curved glass tube.

The opening brass fanfare of the theme song burst out of the small speaker grille, and instantly, both of us got completely carried away. Katie grabbed both of my hands, and for the next sixty seconds we bounced on the balls of our feet in the middle of the carpet, belting out every single word of the intro theme in unison while the animated title cards rolled across the screen.

Then, just as quickly, the final drumbeat of the opening theme faded out, the episode title card appeared, and the two of us were brought gently back to earth.

Without letting go of my hand, Katie dropped down onto the carpet right beside me, leaning her shoulder firmly against mine. I adjusted the volume knob down two notches so the dialogue wouldn’t echo into the hallway, rested my back against the side of my bed frame, and let my sister’s weight anchor me in place while the afternoon cartoons glowed across the quiet room.

Summer Camp at Virginia Dominion University

The Parallel Pair: Dominion Mall & The VDU Fieldhouse

Date: 1994-07-12 at 08:45 America/New_York

Inside the 1994 Virginia Dominion University computer lab, eight-year-old platinum-blonde fraternal twins Nathaniel and Katie Prairie share a desktop computer at Terminal 5 right beside nine-year-old Michael Ragsdale and seven-year-old Rachel Ragsdale at Terminal 4, all wearing royal-blue VDU Summer Camp t-shirts

8:45 AM — Two Pairs on Dominion Mall

When Dad signed Katie and me up for the two-week, all-day block at the Virginia Dominion University Junior Admirals Summer Camp in Norfolk—running from nine o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon—he had one simple goal: keeping the two of us safely out of the house during the middle of July while he was at work.

Katie and I had our own goal, and it was even simpler: we were not letting go of each other.

Standing on the wide, sun-bleached concrete plaza of Dominion Mall at eight-forty-five in the morning, wearing matching royal-blue VDU Summer Camp t-shirts over our shorts, Katie had her fingers wrapped tightly around my right wrist. The humid breeze coming off the Elizabeth River carried the roar of Hampton Boulevard traffic and the loud splash of the circular concrete plaza fountain, and fifteen unfamiliar kids were chattering all around us. Whenever a crowd got that loud, Katie's hand locked onto my arm, and my shoulder stayed angled right beside hers to block out the static.

Two paces ahead of us in the Youth Division line, I noticed we weren't the only brother and sister operating on that exact rule.

A nine-year-old boy with reddish-blond hair and wire-rimmed glasses—whose name tag read Michael—and his seven-year-old sister Rachel, who had dark shoulder-length hair and glasses of her own, were standing hip-to-hip with their fingers laced together in a white-knuckled grip while their fourteen-year-old sister adjusted her backpack beside them before heading over to the Senior Division group. Just like Katie and me, Michael and Rachel didn't care about the cartoons or baseball cards the other campers were shouting about; they were holding onto each other like their lives depended on it.

Naturally, the two college-age counselors running our Youth Division—Counselor Brad and Counselor Kelly—looked at the four of us and reached the exact wrong conclusion.

“All right, Youth Division, let’s buddy up in two lines for the walk across Dominion Mall!” Brad announced over the rush of the fountain, tapping his wooden clipboard with a grin. “Look at this—we’ve got two brothers and two sisters right next to each other! Let’s mix it up today so the boys can hang out with the boys and the girls can hang out with the girls! Michael, step right back here and pair up with Nathaniel! And Rachel, you team up with Katie!”

Before I could protest, Brad guided me a step forward beside Michael, while Kelly gently steered Katie two steps back beside Rachel.

For four seconds, the counselors’ geometry held.

I looked sideways at Michael through the thick Tidewater humidity. Michael looked sideways at me behind his wire-rimmed glasses. Neither of us had anything against the other—in fact, I could tell in half a heartbeat that his brain hated the sudden change in the line just as much as mine did. Behind us, Katie wasn’t saying a word to Rachel, and Rachel wasn’t saying a word to Katie; both of our sisters were staring straight at the backs of our blue camp shirts with their shoulders stiff and their jaws locked tight.

Michael and I didn’t need to say a single word out loud. As soon as Counselor Brad turned his back and held his clipboard up in the air to lead the group across the light-gray concrete squares of Dominion Mall, Michael gave me a tiny, solemn nod, and I nodded right back.

I stepped half a pace to my left. Michael stepped half a pace to his right. In the exact same motion, Katie slipped forward to grab my hand again, and Rachel stepped right back into place on Michael’s left flank.

By the time our sneakers clicked across the second concrete expansion joint past the circular fountain toward the precast-concrete and blue-glass facade of the University Library, the boy-and-girl experiment was completely over. It was brother and sister on the left, and twin brother and twin sister on the right.

9:30 AM — Terminal 4 and Terminal 5

At nine-thirty, the counselors ushered us out of the ninety-degree heat into the sixty-eight-degree air conditioning of the university computer lab.

Thirty beige desktop towers and curved CRT monitors lined the walls, their cooling fans humming in a low, steady chord. I loved computers almost as much as I loved our afternoon cartoons, and Katie loved sitting beside me while we took turns with the mouse and keyboard.

Counselor Brad, however, still hadn’t given up on his clipboard chart.

“Okay, campers, listen up!” Brad called out from the front desk, holding up a plastic tray of 3.5-inch floppy disks. “Boys on the left wall row—we’ve got Wagon Train West and Where on the Map Is Scarlet Devereaux? loaded up! Girls on the right wall row for Digit Chompers and PixelPaint Junior!”

Brad pointed Michael to Terminal 4 and guided me into the rolling plastic chair right next to him at Terminal 5. Across the blue carpet, Counselor Kelly led Rachel and Katie to Terminals 19 and 20 against the opposite wall.

The moment Katie’s hand left my wrist, the hum of the computer lab stopped feeling calming and started feeling like a trap. Down the row to our left, a boy in a basketball cap was pounding his mechanical spacebar with both thumbs and yelling at the screen as his wagon sank in a river. I didn’t touch my keyboard at Terminal 5. Instead, I twisted halfway around in my plastic chair and looked straight across the center aisle.

At Terminal 20, Katie was sitting completely motionless in front of the flashing five-by-five number grid of Digit Chompers, twisting the hem of her royal-blue camp shirt around her fingers while looking back across the carpet at me. Right beside her at Terminal 19, Rachel Ragsdale had pulled both hands off her desk and tucked her knuckles tightly against her chest.

Next to me at Terminal 4, Michael pushed his chair back six inches and looked at his sister. At the exact same moment, I tapped the open corner of my desk at Terminal 5 and motioned to Katie.

While Brad was kneeling beside the dot-matrix printer at the front of the room, Katie and Rachel slid off their chairs in perfect synchronization and walked three quiet steps side by side across the carpet.

Eight-year-old fraternal twins Nathaniel and Katie Prairie sharing Terminal 5 right beside nine-year-old Michael and seven-year-old Rachel Ragsdale at Terminal 4 inside the VDU computer lab

Rachel squeezed onto the right half of Michael’s seat at Terminal 4, and Katie pulled the empty rolling chair from the end of the row right up against my right side at Terminal 5, her long platinum-blonde hair brushing my sleeve as she exhaled a long, quiet breath of relief.

“Hey, girls, your computers are still running over on the right wall—” Counselor Kelly started, walking down the aisle before stopping short as she took in the two identical brother-and-sister teams sitting shoulder-to-shoulder at Terminals 4 and 5.

“She’s playing with me,” Michael told her quietly from Terminal 4, his left hand resting on the arrow keys while Rachel’s right thumb hovered over the spacebar for Digit Chompers. “I steer the square, and Rachel chomps the multiples. That’s how we play.”

I rested my left hand on the keyboard of Terminal 5 and placed Katie’s hand over the beige two-button mouse for Wagon Train West.

“Katie’s my twin,” I said, looking up at Kelly with quiet, unshakable certainty. “We always play together.”

Kelly looked from Michael and Rachel to Katie and me. Neither pair was making noise, neither pair was arguing, and the panicked stiffness had vanished from all four of us the second the sisters were back beside their brothers. Slowly, Kelly smiled, pulled an extra chair over for Rachel so both pairs had two seats pushed flush together, and jotted a quick note on her clipboard.

“Okay,” Kelly said gently. “Michael and Rachel on Terminal 4, Nathaniel and Katie on Terminal 5.”

For the next hour and a half, Katie and I guided our pixel wagon all the way across the western rivers without losing a single ox—trading turns with the mouse while Michael and Rachel cleared screen after screen of Digit Chompers two feet to our left.

1:30 PM — Pair 1 and Pair 2 at the Fieldhouse Pool

After eating our grilled cheese sandwiches side by side in the Monarch Commons dining hall at noon—just a few seats down from where Michael and Rachel’s fourteen-year-old sister Jessica used her written lunch exception on the camp roster to sit with them and quiz them on campus landmarks—our group walked down Hampton Boulevard to the VDU Fieldhouse.

The Fieldhouse was a massive brick athletic building where the Lady Admirals played women’s basketball during the school year while the men’s team played downtown under the concrete dome of the Norfolk Prism. Down the rubber-floored hallway, through the double doors of the Fieldhouse Natatorium, the indoor swimming pool echoed with splashing water and bouncing whistles.

As soon as I stepped out of the boys’ locker room in my swim trunks, Katie stepped out of the girls’ locker room door in her navy one-piece swimsuit, walked straight across the wet white tile, and grabbed my hand with both of hers. Right next to us on the bench, Rachel Ragsdale did the exact same thing with Michael.

Up on the deck beside the white plastic Buddy Board, Counselor Brad held up his thick black grease pencil and tried the gender split one last time.

“Every fifteen minutes when the lifeguard blows the long whistle and yells Buddy Check, you and your buddy have to find each other in the shallow end, grab hands, and hold them up in the air!” Brad called out over the echoing cavern. “Michael and Nathaniel, you guys are Pair Four! Rachel and Katie, you two are Pair Nine!”

Katie squeezed my fingers tightly as thirty kids splashed into the pool at once. I didn’t let go of her hand, and four feet to my left, Michael didn’t let go of Rachel’s. Together, both pairs walked down the wide fiberglass steps into the warm, three-foot shallow end along the side wall.

Two minutes later, the head lifeguard on the high white chair raised his silver whistle to his lips.

TWEEEEET!

“BUDDY CHECK!” the lifeguard shouted through his red megaphone. “Find your buddy and hands in the air!”

Out in the middle of the shallow end, kids who had been chasing each other in Admirals and Anchors pool tag splashed around in circles trying to remember who their assigned partner was.

Along the shallow wall, Katie’s left hand was already laced tightly through my right hand, and Rachel’s right hand was already laced tightly through Michael’s left. Before the whistle had even stopped echoing off the steel roof trusses of the Fieldhouse, all four of us raised our joined hands straight into the air above the water.

Up on the deck, Counselor Brad stared at our two pairs of raised brother-and-sister hands, looked at Counselor Kelly laughing softly behind her clipboard, and finally surrendered. Wiping his rag across the grease pencil on the white plastic board, Brad wrote two new permanent assignments at the very top of the list:

```
PAIR 1: MICHAEL + RACHEL PAIR 2: NATHANIEL + KATIE
```

Katie looked at me as we lowered our arms back into the warm water, a bright, triumphant smile breaking across her face, and across the lane Michael and Rachel shared the exact same quiet grin. For the rest of the two-week camp block—from the morning walk across Dominion Mall to afternoon Four-in-a-Row Grid and Wild Draw cards in the Fieldhouse multipurpose room—nobody at Virginia Dominion University ever tried to separate either pair of siblings again.

Big Family Christmas

The Newport News Train & The Downstairs Sofa Bed

Date: 1994-12-23 at 18:15 America/New_York

On a December 1994 evening in the downstairs living room in Virginia Beach, eight-year-old fraternal twins Nathaniel and Katie Prairie in modest long-sleeved winter flannel pajamas sit side by side under a warm quilt on the unfolded living-room sofa bed holding hands while their cousin Chelsea in flannel pajamas sits near the foot of the bed

6:15 PM — The Newport News Platform

The evening train pulled into the brick ARTS station in Newport News with a long hiss of air brakes and a cloud of white steam rising into the cold December air.

Up on the concrete platform, Katie and I stood side by side in our winter coats with our hands tucked into our pockets, watching the stainless-steel passenger doors slide open. Moments later, Grandma, our Aunt Elizabeth, and our nine-year-old cousin Chelsea stepped down onto the platform carrying their holiday suitcases, and the whole family crowded together to exchange hugs and greetings.

True to form, before we had even walked ten feet past the station canopy toward the parking lot, Aunt Elizabeth wasted no time digging into her coat pocket and lighting up a cigarette.

Beside us, Chelsea immediately scowled and angrily plugged her nose with two fingers.

“Mom, that’s gross,” Chelsea stammered, waving a hand in front of her face as all of us were forced to stand on the cold curb waiting before we could load into the vehicles.

“Liz, put that out,” our dad snapped, his breath fogging in the December chill as he hefted two suitcases into the trunk. “You know damn well that’s not good for you!”

“Alright, alright,” Aunt Liz snapped back, stubbing the cigarette out on the heel of her boot as we sorted ourselves into the two vehicles for the drive back across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel.

Chelsea climbed into the middle of the back bench seat of the sedan right between Katie and me, while Dad and Aunt Liz sat up front. Behind us, Mom—who was having a rare sober evening so Grandma wouldn’t ask questions at the station—drove Grandma in the pickup truck following our taillights down Interstate 64.

As soon as our sedan cleared the tunnel and turned onto the familiar streets of Virginia Beach, Katie leaned forward slightly to look across Chelsea at me, her eyes bright with holiday excitement.

“Welcome to Virginia Beach!” Katie squealed happily, squeezing Chelsea’s mittened hand. “Now, the three of us are going to have to squeeze into one room!”

8:00 PM — Downstairs Sanctuary

When we pulled into the driveway at home, Katie, Chelsea, and I pitched in right away to help Grandma and Aunt Liz carry their overnight bags through the front door.

Standing at the foot of the stairs in the foyer, Dad laid out the holiday room assignments.

“You three will share the sofa bed,” Dad said to us kids, gesturing toward the living room. Turning to the adults, he added, “Mom, Katie’s room is closer to the upstairs bathroom. Liz, you get Nathaniel’s room.”

In a lot of houses, getting evicted from both of our upstairs bedrooms for the holidays would have felt like a punishment. To Katie and me, however, Dad had just handed us the greatest logistical gift of Christmas. With Grandma in Katie’s room, Aunt Liz in my room, and Mom and Dad behind their closed door at the end of the upstairs hall, all four adults were confined to the second floor—which meant the entire first floor belonged exclusively to the three of us kids.

“Chelsea, there’s a bathroom down here we can use,” Katie explained immediately, pointing down the short hallway off the living room. “It has a shower. We can stay downstairs while the adults are upstairs.”

“Okay,” our cousin replied, setting her backpack by the couch. “Where do we sleep?”

“The three of us will sleep down here. This sofa is a sofa bed,” Katie replied proudly as the three of us finished carrying the last of the adults’ bags up the stairs.

Because the train had arrived late in the evening, dinner was fast and simple—warm bowls of soup and buttered rolls around the dining table—and before nine o’clock, the adults retreated upstairs for the night, leaving the first floor completely to the three of us.

“I want to take a shower,” Chelsea announced to Katie and me once the upstairs footsteps quieted down.

Katie walked her down the short hall to show her how to turn the downstairs shower faucet on and where the clean towels were stacked, then came back out into the living room where I had already changed into my long-sleeved flannel pajamas and was busy pulling the heavy metal frame of the sofa bed out from inside the couch. Working together, Katie and I unfolded the mattress, smoothed out the clean cotton sheets, and spread two thick winter quilts across the top.

A few minutes later, the bathroom door clicked open. Instead of putting her pajamas on inside the bathroom, Chelsea wandered straight out into the living room wrapped only in a bath towel, making her way casually toward the sofa bed Katie and I had just finished setting up.

“CHELSEA!” Katie stammered, her hand shooting out in a flash to clamp firmly over my eyes. “Your cousin shouldn’t be seeing all of you!”

Before Chelsea could even blink, Katie spun her right back around by the shoulders and shunted her straight back into the downstairs bathroom to finish drying off and put her flannel pajamas on properly.

“You need to stop blushing,” my twin sister admonished me once the bathroom door clicked shut behind Chelsea—except she didn’t truly admonish me at all, letting out a quiet, bubbly giggle as she took her hand off my face. “You promise not to tell anyone?”

“Promise,” I replied, rubbing the bridge of my nose as we both climbed onto the left side of the wide sofa bed in our flannel pajamas and pulled the heavy winter quilt up to our chins.

Eight-year-old fraternal twins Nathaniel and Katie Prairie in full winter flannel pajamas holding hands under the quilt on the downstairs living-room sofa bed while cousin Chelsea sits in her pajamas near the foot of the bed

“You know Chelsea sometimes forgets the rules when she’s in a different house,” Katie whispered, leaning her head against my shoulder underneath the quilt and lacing her fingers through mine. “As long as we look out for each other down here, nobody upstairs is going to yell at anyone.”

“Not a word to anyone,” I whispered back, squeezing her hand.

Two minutes later, Chelsea came back out of the hallway wearing her full green flannel pajamas, fuzzy socks, and a sheepish grin, and climbed under the quilt on the far side of the sofa bed. With the living room lamp clicked off and only thecolored lights of the Christmas tree glowing softly in the corner, Katie stayed tucked right against my side—the two of us holding down our downstairs sanctuary while the winter wind rattled the front windows.

Middle School & The Blizzard of ’96

The Blizzard of ’96

Snow Day in Virginia Beach & The Backyard Promise

Date: 1996-01-06 at 11:30 America/New_York

During the Blizzard of January 1996 in their snow-covered Virginia Beach backyard in front of a white wooden picket fence at dusk, Katie Prairie in a blue winter jacket and dark jeans and her twin brother Nathaniel Prairie in a black winter jacket and blue jeans hold each other in a tight bear hug in the falling snow

11:30 AM — Waiting for the First Flakes

In Virginia Beach, real snow was rare enough that the mere rumor of a winter storm was enough to bring our entire street to a standstill.

On the first Saturday of January 1996, Katie and I stood shoulder to shoulder at my upstairs bedroom window, pressing our palms against the cold wooden sill as we stared out at the residential street below. Outside, the air was bitterly cold, and heavy, slate-gray clouds were rolling in off the Atlantic until the sky looked like brushed steel. Behind us on my bedroom stand, the local Norfolk news station had cut into regular Saturday morning programming, the meteorologist standing in front of a swirling radar map warning all of Hampton Roads to prepare for the Blizzard of ’96.

“You think we’re going to have snow?” Katie asked, her breath fogging a small circle on the glass pane.

“Hope so. SNOW DAY!” I said, practically vibrating with excitement as I looked from the heavy sky back to the radar bands on the screen. Even on a Saturday, a real blizzard meant Monday and Tuesday would be wiped clean off the school calendar.

“Snow,” Katie replied hopefully, leaning her shoulder against mine as the news anchor continued to drone on and on about wind gusts, coastal flooding, and how many inches were expected by nightfall.

At twelve-thirty, while Katie and I were sitting side by side at the kitchen table eating our lunch sandwiches, the first white flakes began to drift past the dining room window. At first it wasn’t much—just fine, powdery crystals swirling across the dry grass—but within twenty minutes the flakes grew thick and steady, dusting the wooden fence rails and the roof of Dad’s car.

“Wonder if it will stick,” Katie giggled, pointing her finger toward the patio.

By late afternoon, it didn’t just stick; it buried the entire backyard under a clean, silent blanket of white.

Inside the house, however, the quiet didn’t last. Around five o’clock, the familiar, sharp sound of Mom’s and Dad’s voices started rising from the upstairs hallway—first a slammed cabinet door, then the bitter, overlapping shouting match that always followed whenever Dad found another empty bottle hidden behind the pantry cans.

5:45 PM — The Backyard Bear Hug

Katie and I didn’t wait for the yelling to reach the staircase. We pulled on our heavy winter jackets and boots and slipped out the back door into the twilight snow.

Out in the backyard, inside the perimeter of our white wooden picket fence, the falling snow acted like a giant acoustic blanket over the neighborhood. The streetlamps glowed pale orange through the swirling flakes, and every footstep made a soft, muted crunch under our shoes.

Standing near the center of the yard with the snow settling onto my short blonde hair, the cold wind hit my face, and all at once the weight of everything we had been carrying over the past year caught up with me. My chest tightened, and before I could stop myself, I started sniffling in the cold air.

Katie turned around immediately. She didn’t hesitate for a second—she stepped straight through the snow and pulled me into a tight, fierce bear hug, wrapping both of her blue-jacketed arms around my shoulders.

Katie Prairie in her blue winter jacket and Nathaniel Prairie in his black winter jacket holding each other in a tight bear hug in their snow-covered Virginia Beach backyard in front of the white picket fence during the Blizzard of ’96

“What’s wrong?” Katie asked softly against my ear, holding onto me with all her strength.

“I’m just so happy you’re willing to do all of this for me,” I whispered into her shoulder, my voice shaking slightly as I held onto the back of her winter coat, unsure of how to put the rest of the knot in my chest into words.

Katie didn’t need me to explain it. Because she was my twin, she already knew the exact two things crushing my ribs.

“You’re still upset with last year, and that girl everyone thought you had a crush on?” Katie asked gently.

“Yes, I am,” I whimpered, burying my face against her collar, overwhelmingly grateful that my twin sister was hugging me instead of telling me to toughen up. All through the previous spring at school, a pack of kids in our grade had latched onto a rumor that I had a crush on a girl in our homeroom, turning every hallway change and cafeteria period into a relentless, mocking gauntlet that wouldn’t stop no matter what I said. “And it does not help that Mom and Dad are arguing with each other again. I just want to enjoy the snow without the screaming.”

“I’m right here, and I will never leave you,” Katie replied fiercely, pulling me into an even tighter bear hug as the heavy January snow came down all around us in the twilight. “I’m your sister, and I would just never, ever leave you.”

She held onto me for a long moment in the quiet yard, letting the steady pressure of her arms slow my breathing down, before she spoke again.

“Your classmates are mean,” Katie continued, her voice firm against the cold wind. “Especially when they refuse to back down. When we go back to school, I will gladly play my part of pretend girlfriend so they leave you alone.”

“Thank you, but I think everyone knows that you’re my sister,” I whispered, managing a small, shaky laugh even as my teeth started chattering from the twenty-degree air.

“Come on, let’s head back inside before we freeze,” Katie said, taking my hand and leading me back across the snow-covered grass toward the back door.

Inside the warm kitchen, the shouting upstairs had finally stopped—Mom had gone to bed for the night, and the house was still again. Standing beside the dark green laminate counter with the snow piling up against the dining room window glass behind us, Katie wrapped her arms around my neck for one more long, warming hug until the chill left my fingers.

“Let’s use my bed tonight,” I whispered as we started walking up the stairs together. “This way we can see the street from my window when we wake up in the morning.”

“Sure,” Katie smiled. “I hope we wake up to snow on the ground like there is right now.”

At the top of the landing, I paused outside my bedroom door and looked at her. “Real quick, if you’re going to spend the night with me: what should we do about getting changed?”

“I’ll go change into my warm pajamas in my room and grab my pillow, and I’ll knock when I’m ready,” Katie whispered with a practical nod.

Three minutes later, after I had pulled on my own heavy winter flannel pajamas and climbed under the covers by the window, three quiet knocks sounded against my door.

“Cartoons are for life,” Katie whispered from the hall.

“Come on in,” I whispered back.

Carrying her pillow under her arm in her purple fleece pajamas, Katie crossed the carpet and climbed under the heavy blanket right at my side. Outside my bedroom window, the Blizzard of ’96 howled silently across Virginia Beach, piling deep drifts against the curb under the glow of the streetlamp, while inside the warm perimeter of my bed, my twin sister and I fell fast asleep holding hands.

Katie Is Dumped

No More Fighting & The Dinner Dance Promise

Date: 1997-10-16 at 16:15 America/New_York

Inside Katie’s magenta-purple bedroom with a framed blue morpho butterfly artwork on the wall, early-teen Katie Prairie in a dark navy short-sleeve t-shirt and white jeans and her twin brother Nathaniel Prairie in a maroon short-sleeve t-shirt and blue jeans stand facing each other holding both hands as Nathaniel comforts her

4:15 PM — Tears Under the Blue Butterfly

Middle school had a way of taking kids who had been inseparable since birth and trying to pull them into two completely separate orbits.

For the first month of seventh grade, while I spent my afternoons quiet in my room with my video games, Katie had tried her hardest to fit into the normal middle-school social script—eating lunch with the girls from her English class and going out with a seventh-grade boy named Donnie. And because both of us were stressed out by the louder hallways, the changing class bells, and Mom's drinking getting worse at home, the two of us had fallen into the stupid habit of bickering over small things whenever we passed each other in the upstairs hall.

On Thursday afternoon, all of that stopped the second I walked up the stairs and heard the sound coming through Katie's bedroom door.

Katie was crying up a storm—deep, ragged sobs that echoed right through the hollow wooden door into the hallway.

I dropped my backpack by my door and stepped into her room to check on her and see what was wrong.

Katie was standing near the foot of her bed against the bright magenta-purple wall beneath her framed blue morpho butterfly print, her shoulders shaking inside her dark navy t-shirt and her hands pressed over her face.

"Leave me alone," she sobbed, turning her head half away when she heard my sneakers on the carpet. "You'd never understand."

I didn't walk out, and I didn't snap back the way a typical middle-school brother would have. Stepping quietly across the room, I placed my hand gently on her shoulder.

"What is it?" I asked softly.

Katie continued sobbing for several seconds, her chest heaving as she tried to catch her breath. I realized immediately that this wasn't a small hallway argument—this was serious. It took her a long moment to realize that I wasn't going to tease her or make fun of her for crying.

Slowly, she lowered her hands from her tear-streaked face.

"Donnie dumped me," Katie choked out, fresh tears spilling down her cheeks. "I loved him, and he dumped me!"

I reached my hand out to gently wipe the tears from her eyes. Never having had a girlfriend myself—and never having been dumped—I didn't fully understand the mechanics of middle-school romance, but I didn't need to understand romance to see how badly my twin sister was hurting.

Katie reached out with both hands and took mine, holding onto my fingers tightly as if she were drowning and I was the only solid ground in the room.

Early-teen Katie Prairie and her twin brother Nathaniel Prairie standing inside Katie's purple-walled bedroom in front of the framed blue butterfly artwork, holding both hands as Nathaniel comforts her after she was dumped

"Please… don't let go," she whispered, her voice raw.

I closed both of my hands around hers and held on firmly. Looking straight into my eyes with a sudden, desperate seriousness, Katie asked the question that mattered most to survival in a middle-school cafeteria:

"Will you sit with me at lunch?"

The look on Katie's upset face told me the only answer she needed to hear—and it was the exact answer I wanted to give her anyway.

"Yes," I answered without hesitation. "I'll sit with you at lunch."

Katie burst into fresh tears of pure relief, letting go of my fingers only to throw both arms around my neck and pull me into a tight hug.

"Thank you," she whispered against my shoulder.

I could hear how raspy and sore her throat was from all of her crying, so I offered to run downstairs and get her a cold glass of water, but she shook her head and held onto my shirt even tighter. As I wrapped my arms around her waist and hugged her back in the quiet room, I felt something shift permanently inside my chest. All the petty squabbling we had done over the past few weeks felt completely, utterly stupid. Katie didn't want to stop hugging me, and I didn't have a single problem with that.

"Please, no more fighting," my sister sobbed softly into my shoulder.

"I understand," I promised, resting my chin against the top of her blonde hair as we continued to hold onto each other.

"I'm still upset, but thanks for this," Katie murmured a minute later as I felt a few more warm tears soak into the shoulder of my maroon t-shirt.

“Katie, I’m here for you,” I told her. And as I said the words out loud, squeezing my arms around my twin sister, I realized just how much more I loved hugging her and keeping her safe than arguing with her.

5:00 PM — The Pretend Date & PB&J Sanctuary

When her crying finally began to subside, the two of us sat down side by side on the edge of her green-and-gold patterned bedspread, our shoulders pressed together and our hands still linked.

“Thank you,” Katie said quietly, wiping her eyes with the back of her wrist. “Thank you for being there for me. Someday, I know I’m going to repay this.”

She went quiet for a beat, looking down at our joined hands, before she suddenly whispered:

“Take me to the Dinner Dance this week.”

The seventh-grade Dinner Dance was tomorrow night in the school cafeteria, and half the reason Katie had been crying so hard was the thought of either staying home alone in embarrassment or walking into that room by herself while Donnie was there.

“Of course we can go together,” I said immediately, knowing I didn’t have a date of my own—and wouldn’t have wanted to go with anyone else even if I did. “Even though you’re my sister, we will go on a pretend date.”

“Oh, thank you. Thank you,” Katie breathed, the last of the heavy sobs finally leaving her chest as she leaned her head against my shoulder.

“Would you like it if I made you dinner tonight?” I asked, deciding right then and there to start playing my part as her protective pretend boyfriend.

“Let’s just have something simple, like sandwiches,” she said softly.

“Alright,” I replied, giving her hand a gentle squeeze as the two of us stood up and headed downstairs together.

In the quiet kitchen, I made us both thick peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches and poured two tall glasses of cold milk to soothe her sore throat. After we finished eating at the table, Katie looked across at me.

“Could we watch a movie together?” she asked.

“Sure,” I replied warmly. “Let’s pick something together.”

We walked back upstairs to my deep-blue bedroom, picked out a comedy tape from the shelf beneath my television stand, and pushed it into the VCR. As the opening studio credits began to roll across the CRT screen, Katie kicked off her shoes and climbed into my single bed right at my side, resting her head on my shoulder and pulling the blanket across our legs.

Near the end of the movie, when the closing music faded in, I glanced down and saw that my sister was fast asleep against my arm, her breathing slow and completely peaceful after an afternoon of crying her eyes out.

I reached carefully for the remote, clicked the television off, and decided right then to let her sleep.Katie was exhausted, and the last thing I wanted was to wake her up and make her trudge down the hall alone in the dark. Part of me marveled at how natural it felt sharing my narrow bed with my twin sister again—just like we had during the Blizzard of ’96 and on the downstairs sofa bed at Christmas. We had chosen this close brother-and-sister bond together, and enjoying the warm, quiet company of the person who mattered most to me in the world, I slid down onto the pillow beside her and let myself drift off to sleep at her side.

The Pretend Boyfriend & Twins’ Day

Twin Brothers Always Stay: Spirit Week & The Living Room Sofa

Date: 1997-10-17 at 07:30 America/New_York

Early-teen fraternal twins Katie and Nathaniel Prairie with matching light platinum-blonde hair, wearing identical maroon short-sleeve t-shirts and blue jeans for Spirit Week Twins’ Day, sit snuggled close together on their tan-brown living room sofa with Katie’s arm draped around Nathaniel’s shoulders

7:30 AM — “Twin Brothers Always Stay”

The next morning, when the pale autumn sunlight filtered through the blinds of my bedroom, I woke up first—and sure enough, Katie was still fast asleep right at my side in the small bed.

“Katie,” I whispered softly, gently prodding her shoulder so I wouldn’t startle her in case she didn’t realize right away that she had fallen asleep in my room the night before.

My sister stirred against the pillow, blinking her blue eyes open in the quiet blue room before looking from the wall to me in mild surprise.

“Morning, sleepyhead,” I whispered with a small smile.

“I slept in your bed?” she asked groggily, rubbing her eyes.

“Yep, and I did not mind,” I replied, looking her straight in the eye. “Let’s play a game together.”

For the first time since Donnie had broken her heart yesterday afternoon, Katie’s face lit up with genuine excitement. While she sat up against the headboard, I slipped out of bed, walked across the carpet to the television stand, and powered on my Nova video game console. I was still in full protective-brother mode, determined to keep cheering her up until I heard her laugh again.

Before I picked up the controller, I turned back to face her.

“I’m your brother. I will always be here for you. Promise,” I told her, my voice steady and earnest in the quiet room. I paused for half a beat, then added the truth I knew we would live by for the rest of our lives: “Boyfriends come and go, but Twin Brothers always stay. Always.”

Before the console title screen had even finished loading on the CRT television, I found myself wrapped in Katie’s arms again. She stood up from the edge of the mattress and hugged me with everything she had, making it unmistakably clear that she had no intention of letting go of me. She held onto my shoulders while the video game rolled through its opening demo sequence on the screen behind us, then sat down on the carpet right at my side.

“We should probably get dressed,” Katie said after a moment, glancing down at her wrinkled shirt from yesterday. “Guess I will pop into my room real quick. Leave the game on this screen while we get dressed?”

“Sure,” I replied, gently ushering her to the bedroom door. “I’ll open my door when I’m dressed.”

8:00 AM — Spirit Week: Twins’ Day

Five minutes later, after I had pulled on a clean maroon short-sleeve t-shirt, medium-wash blue jeans, and my tan sneakers, I opened my bedroom door. Katie walked right back in from across the hall—and the second I saw what she had picked out of her closet, I had to grin.

Without planning it, she had put on the exact same shade of maroon short-sleeve t-shirt and medium-wash blue jeans with a dark belt.

“Next week is Spirit Week at school,” I said as she stepped into the room. “Want to have a little fun on Twins’ Day, since, well, we are twins?”

Katie giggled as I handed her the second black controller from the floor stand. “Yeah, we are twins! Wonder how many others will really be twins compared to how many will do it just for fun.”

We both laughed out loud at that remark, and right there in front of my computer desk and television stand, we stubbornly made up our minds.

“I think it’s settled, then,” I declared. “We will dress exactly the same, and we will enter the contest.”

We laughed again, already looking forward to seeing how the teachers and our classmates would react to actual fraternal twins walking into the Spirit Week Twins’ Day assembly dressed identically and holding hands.

“Too bad we don’t have matching shoes,” Katie remarked, looking down at her grey-and-red sneakers next to my tan ones.

“Ah, well. Still, let’s do what we can. I think these pants and shirts look close enough,” I said, setting the controllers on the desk and pulling her into another tight, standing hug in the middle of the room. Both of us laughed into each other’s shoulders, our matching maroon sleeves wrapped around each other’s backs. Yesterday’s tears were completely gone.

5:30 PM — Macaroni & Cheese on the Living Room Sofa

Later that evening, after spending the afternoon practicing our co-op levels and getting ready for the weekend, Katie and I walked downstairs and decided to sit together on the tan-brown living room sofa, curling up side by side while we waited for dinner to be made.

As usual in our house, Dad was in the kitchen working over the stove after a full day at his job, while upstairs Mom was already passed out drunk in bed behind her closed door.

Early-teen fraternal twins Katie and Nathaniel Prairie in matching maroon t-shirts and blue jeans snuggled close together on the living room sofa with Katie’s arm around Nathaniel’s shoulders

“Mac and cheese is what I smell,” I whispered as Katie slid flush against my right side on the sofa cushions, draped her left arm warmly around my shoulders, and rested her right hand across my forearm to hold me close to her.

“Our favorite,” she replied softly, resting her cheek near my shoulder as the two of us sat there, happily snuggled up together beneath the blue-framed underwater painting on the living room wall.

We had a few quiet minutes to ourselves before the timer on the stove went off, and neither of us wanted to get off the sofa. After years of feeling like we had to keep our guard up against loud classrooms and the unpredictable storms upstairs, snuggling together on the couch felt like the safest, most comfortable place on earth.

As we sat there in the warm glow of the living room lamp, Katie whispered, “Snuggling up is just so comfortable.”

“It is,” I replied quietly, leaning into the warmth of her arm around my shoulders. Neither of us moved an inch; we were both completely content holding onto each other and letting the rest of the house fade away.

A few minutes later, Dad stepped to the doorway of the dining room with a pot holder in his hand, looking over at the two of us curled up together on the couch before calling us in to eat.

When we sat down side by side at the dining table over our steaming bowls of macaroni and cheese, Dad looked across the table at the two of us, his tired eyes softening with genuine gratitude.

“I really appreciate that you both don’t fight and argue with each other,” Dad said quietly, his voice heavy with emotion. “Honestly, I wish your mother didn’t drink her life away. I want to do my best to not only be your father, but also be a proper dad to both of you. Your mother’s drinking is not your fault, and I don’t want either of you to think that. Please don’t let your grades suffer because of it.”

Underneath the edge of the dining table, Katie reached her hand over and laced her fingers tightly through mine, and I squeezed right back. Whatever happened upstairs, and whatever happened in the hallways at school, my twin sister and I had our sanctuary—and we were never letting go.