Katie & Nathaniel

Early Childhood
- The Great Afternoon
  - Cartoons Are for Life: The Secret Password & The Afternoon Sanctuary
- Summer Camp at Virginia Dominion University
  - The Parallel Pair: Dominion Mall & The VDU Fieldhouse
- Big Family Christmas
  - The Newport News ARTS Train & The Downstairs Sofa Bed

Middle School & The Blizzard of ’96
- The Blizzard of ’96
  - Snow Day in Virginia Beach & The Backyard Promise
- Katie Is Dumped
  - No More Fighting & The Dinner Dance Promise
- The Pretend Boyfriend & Twins’ Day
  - Twin Brothers Always Stay: Spirit Week & The Living Room Sofa

Sixteen & Summer Sanctuary
- Bonding With My Sister
  - Summer Sanctuary: Hearthstone Pizza, The Sunlit Valley, & Katie’s Room
- End of Summer Cruise
  - Part 1: The I-95 Haul, The Quantum Basic Library Book, & Ditching Captain Barnaby
  - Part 2: The Nassau Pier, Guest Services, & The Last Straw
  - Part 3: Stateroom 6004, The Loaner Wheelchairs, & Pizza for Three on the Aft Deck
  - Part 4: Back on Dry Land & The Twelve-Hour Drive Up I-95
  - Part 5: Monday Morning in Virginia Beach — The Divorce Lawyer, The PCP, & Borrowed Time
- Junior Year at Northwood High & The Prognosis
  - Part 1: The Fault-Grounds Filing, The Protective Order, & Junior Year at Northwood High School
  - Part 2: When Borrowed Time Runs Out — The Collapse at School, The Emergency Room Escalation, & Time for Powerchairs
  - Part 3: Two Compact Power Wheelchairs in the Trunk, Downsizing to Military Highway, & CVTA Route 15
- Sixteen on Four Wheels & Finding Dates
  - Part 1: Navigating Northwood High on Four Wheels, Two First Dates, & Why We Ride on Saturday
  - Part 2: Cousin Wesley, Ryan’s Escalator Exit, & Two Dates at Emerald Creek Mall

Seventeen, Senior Year, & Greenway Court
- Drunken New Year
  - Part 1: The Gas-Station Run, A Box of Dry Cereal, & Why I Never Had a Twenty-First Birthday Drink

Part 2: The Drunken New Year Lie, Heather's Bitter Goodbye, & Twin Sisters Always Stay
Greenway Court, Apartment A6 & The Square Closet Sanctuary
Part 1: Apartment A6 on Greenway Court, Dad's Microwave Cart, & Across-the-Hall Neighbors
Part 2: Brenda in the Back Alley & Discovering the Square Closet Sanctuary
Part 3: Hurricane Isabel, Two Layers of Sandbags at Greenway Court, & Two Weeks at Dad's House on Arvin Road
The Admiral Center Bookstore & Meeting Tiffany
Part 1: Death by Cascading Style Sheets & Iced Cocoa at Chapters & Co.
Part 2: Saturday Pizza in Apartment A6 & Katie's Wholehearted Blessing
Part 3: Tiffany's Pitch for Our Own Place in Ocean View & The Promise of Brother-and-Sister Weekends
West Ocean View & Reclaiming Our Sanctuary
Ocean View Station, Dirty Old Tonomy Hill, & Five Buses from Williamsburg
Part 1: Ocean View Station, The Green Sofa Confrontation, & Speak Now or Forever Hold Your Peace
Part 2: Riding Route 1 Back to West Ghent, Meeting Brandon Mercer at The Admiral Center, & Taking Things Slow
Part 3: Patience at Katie's Pace, Winning Over Nate and Dad, & Katie's Move to Williamsburg
Part 4: The Worst Christmas Ever: Eighteen Stops to Dirty Old Tonomy Hill, Four Days with Cousin Chelsea, & The West Main Road Shortcut Home
Part 5: Five Buses from Williamsburg — The Ninety-Second Window, Crown Burger, & The Last Route 61 Across the Water
The End of Hell & Reclaiming Apartment 3
Part 1: A Sister's Worst Nightmare, Tiffany Forces a Choice, & Scrubbing Out the Filth
Part 2: The 8:13 AM Bus to CCHR, All-New Queen Bedding, Dad's Pickup Truck, & The Hallway Closet Sanctuary
Part 3: The Goyeau Street Tunnel Bus, The Federal Courthouse on Granby Street, & Protected Non-Traveling Complainant
Part 4: Thanksgiving Dinner at Dad's House, The Black Friday Closet Project, & The Secret on the Closet Floor
Part 5: The Seattle Transit Blog Inspiration & Quietly Launching Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit
Part 6: The CCHR Disability Counselor, The Glossy Fishersville Pitch, & Why Brother and Sister Should Get to Share a Dorm Room
Twelve Days at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center & Walking Out for Good
Barton Hall Check-In, Rushing Voc Eval in One Week, & 'Door Greeter!?'
Part 1: Sunday Check-In at Barton Hall, The Opposite-Gender Dorm Rule, & Expelling the Creepy Roommate
Part 2: Rushing Voc Eval in One Week, Auto Shop & 'Door Greeter!?', Refusing Separation, & Staying Stuck on Level 2
Starting Web Apps While Stuck in Barton Hall, Sleeping in the Closet, & The Chickenshit Report
Part 1: Starting Web Apps While Stuck on Level 2 in Barton Hall, Quantum OS 2000 Professional, & Meeting Tina, Jim, and Sheila
Part 2: Emergency in the Therapeutic Pool, Caught Sleeping Together in a Closet, Calling the Staffer's Bluff, & The Chickenshit Report
The Dormitory Room Mix-Up, Tina's Daybed in Luray, & Leaving RRC After Twelve Days
Part 1: The Dormitory Room Mix-Up, Blind Red-Tape Room Reassignments, & A Sleepless Night for Natalie

Part 2: Sharing the Daybed at Tina's House in Luray, Walking Out After Twelve Days, & Coming Home to Kempsville
Unofficial Homeowners: Back Home in Virginia Beach (2007–2008)
Arvin Road, Crossing Without a Crosswalk, Horizontal IDs on Route 12, & Yearly Passes at Fairlawn
Part 1: Unofficial Homeowners, One Bedroom and One Office, & The Closet We Both Know We'll Use
Part 2: Dr. Carter's Exam Room, Skin to Skin in the Closet, & No Crosswalks at Military and Indian River
Part 3: Crossing Both Roads for Route 12, Buckner Boulevard DMV, & Horizontal State IDs on the Spot
Part 4: The :07 Bus From Glenrock Mall, Yearly Memberships at Fairlawn Rec Center, & The 1977 Building's Quirks
A Near-Miss at Dying Glenrock Mall, Locking Down WHOIS, & Forming Our Virginia LLC
Part 1: A Dying Single-Story Mall, Spotting Brenda in the Concourse, & The WHOIS Wake-Up Call
Part 2: Dad's Legal Consultation, Our Virginia LLC, & A Virtual Mailbox at The Parcel Center
Twenty-Two in Alexandria: Riding DMV Transit, Touring the White House & the U.S. Capitol, Meeting Senator James West, The Spark to Run for City Council, & Two Blue Passports
Part 1: Accessible Taxi to Newport News, The ARTS Train to Alexandria, & Riding Northern Virginia Transit on Our Twenty-Second Birthday
Part 2: Unclipping Our Backpacks, Where Is President George W. Walker Today?, & The White House Tour That Sparked a Political Calling
Part 3: Beneath the Capitol Dome: Touring the Crypt, the Rotunda, National Statuary Hall, & the Historic Old Senate Chamber
Part 4: Meeting Senator James West, Watching the U.S. Senate From the Gallery, & Why Can't We Ride the Bus to City Hall?
Part 5:
Associate Degrees in Hand, 'Not the Right Skill Match,' & Launching Prairie Twin Interactive From Arvin Road
Associate Degrees in Hand, 'Not the Right Skill Match,' & Putting Our Virginia LLC to Work
Do Better: Ideas for CVTA & The Kempsville City Council
Do Better: Ideas for CVTA & The Four-Bus Mayoral Loop
Part 1: Does the Bus Run? Calling Out CVTA's Complacency & The 2008 Regional Mayoral Challenge
Part 2: The Four-Bus Mayoral Loop, Silenced at Eighteenth Street, & Choosing to Run for the Kempsville Seat
The Empty Podium on WHRC TV-15, The 94.1% Landslide, & Councilwoman Prairie
Part 1: The Empty Podium on WHRC TV-15, The 8:24 PM Three-Bus Sprint Home, & The Front-Page Metro Headline
Part 2: The WTGA 790 AM Disability Attack, The 94.1% Landslide, & The Eighteenth Street Reckoning
The Gentlewoman from Virginia Beach: The House of Delegates
Stopped at the Third-Floor Gallery, Seated by Delegate Ronald Villa, & Winning the 85th District
Part 1: Stopped at the Third-Floor Gallery by Capitol Police, Seated on the House Floor Near Delegate Ronald Villa, & The Spark to Run
Part 2: Telling Dad at Our Kempsville Kitchen Table, The 125-Signature Ballot Petition at CCHR, & Winning the Eighty-Fifth House District

- Freshman Session on West Broad Street & Riding JRTC Route 6 to the Capitol
  - Part 1: The West Broad Street Loft, Unpacking Our Shared Queen Bed, & Weekend Reconnaissance on JRTC Route 6
  - Part 2: Gold License Plates vs. JRTC Route 6, Turning Down the Parking Deck Pass, & The 60-Inch ADA Restroom Showdown
- House Bill 663 & Live on Meet the Nation
  - Part 1: Line 18, Seated by Delegate Ronald Villa on the Floor, & A Question Across the Chamber
  - Part 2: Transit Legislative Day with Michael & Rachel, Two Meltdowns in Room 518, & The 6:05 AM Train to Meet the Nation

Across the Rotunda: The Senate of Virginia

- Watching Senator Ward Kill Our Bills Across the Rotunda & The 250-Signature Petition
  - Watching Senator Ward Kill Our Bills Across the Rotunda, Brainstorming the 7th Senate District with Dad, & The 250-Signature Rule
- Flipping the Seventh Senate District, The Mahogany Senate Ramp, & Madam Chair
  - Flipping the Seventh Senate District, Custom-Milling the Mahogany Senate Ramp, & Swearing In as Madam Chair
- The Accessibility Project: Riding Every Bus Across the Commonwealth for the United States Senate
  - Part 1: The Living Room Decision in Kempsville, The 10,000-Signature Rule, & The Accessibility Project
  - Part 2: The Jammed Ramp on Victoria Boulevard, ShoreLine Transit Across the Bay, & Wearing the NFA's 'F' Grade in Fairfax
  - Part 3: The Roanoke Express, The Brooks Family Compound on Lee Highway, The Maroon Express to Bluewater, & Winning the June Primary
  - Part 4: Riding Into Deep-Red RTR Country: Mountain Empire Transit, The Coalfields, & Cumberland Gap With Dad
  - Part 5: Katie's Favorite Place in Virginia: The Cassini Center in Highland County & The October WHRC TV-15 Three-Bus Sprint

The Senator from Virginia

- Election Night, The Decision Desk Call, & The Referendum Mandate
  - Part 1: Polls Close at Seven, The 8:42 PM Decision Desk Call, & Victory in Virginia Beach
  - Part 2: The Morning After in Kempsville, The School Tax Referendum, & Jess's Open Letter on The Grid
  - Part 3: U.S. Senate New Member Orientation, Senator Tess Dunmore's Ramp, & Making the Vice President Swear Her In
  - Part 4: Opposing Leader Schuman, The 211–204 Lame-Duck False Dawn in the Dirksen Basement, & Home Across the Fenwick Bridge
- The Minified ZIP File, The Raw HTML Takedown, & Resigning from Richmond
  - Part 1: The Minified ZIP Trick, Barely Commented Code, & The Live WCAG Takedown
  - Part 2: Article IV Section 4, Hand-Delivering Her Resignation in Richmond, & The Writ of Special Election
- First Train from Norfolk, Swearing In on the Constitution, & Strings Attached for RRC
  - Part 1: Three Business Class Tickets for Free Café Car Drinks & The Mobile Lift at Alexandria
  - Part 2: The Yellow Line Over the Fenwick Bridge, The Full-Chair Portrait, & Swearing In on the Constitution
  - Part 3: The First Invite to Cocktails, A Known Side Effect of Death, & Home to Sunset Drive

Part 4: The Constituent Line in Room 511, ‘Is Nathaniel Still With You?’, & What Really Happened to Natalie
Part 5: 34 C.F.R. Section 361.38, Two Twelve-Day Dropouts in Room 511, & Strings Attached at the Subcommittee Hearing
The Norfolk Carrier Leak, Suite 756 at Timberline Shopping Center, & Three Convictions in the Senate
Part 1: The South Lawn Tirade, The Norfolk Carrier Leak, & Why the Order of the Trials Matters
Part 2: Route 36 to Timberline Shopping Center, Lunch at Don Miller Subs, Retro Games at Neat Stuff, & Suite 756
Part 3: The Words of Mason, Madison, and Lincoln, Three Guilty Votes, & From Capitol Police Protection Back to Normal Life at Pleasure House Road
Street Clothes on the Route 250 Connector, Unannounced in Fishersville, & Calling the Governor
ARTS Train 51 to Staunton, Street Clothes on the Route 250 Connector, & Calling Governor Langford From Fishersville
Three Senate Terms, Refusing the 2044 Nomination, & The Stop #0812 Four-Seat Presidential Endorsement Loop
Part 1: The Biggest Prize in the Primary: Sam, Mandy, & Sarah’s Bus-Loop Plan & Stop #0812
Part 2: The First Tuesday on the Loop: Governor Harrison Caldwell on Routes 15, 800, 25, & 12
Part 3: The Second Tuesday on the Loop: Representative Devon Pierce on Routes 15, 800, 25, & 12
Part 4: The Thursday Morning Loop: Governor Elena Delgado & The Six O’Clock Upload

Early Childhood

The Great Afternoon

Cartoons Are for Life: The Secret Password & The Afternoon Sanctuary

Date: 1994-05-18 at 15:30 America/New_York

3:30 PM — The Secret Password

Three polite, measured knocks sounded against the painted wood of my closed bedroom door just as the red digital clock on the cable converter box ticked to 3:29.

“Cartoons are for life,” came Katie’s voice through the wood, hushed and completely serious.

The secret password was given. Immediately, I scrambled up off the dark low-pile carpet of my deep-blue bedroom and swung the door open to admit my twin sister just in time for our favorite afternoon block of cartoons. Having just turned nine years old back on April eighth, neither of us cared what the other kids on our street in Virginia Beach were doing after the school bus dropped us off. School was six straight hours of scraping desks, unpredictable bells, and teachers who tried to seat fraternal twins on opposite sides of the hallway just because I was a boy and Katie was a girl. To the teachers at school and the adults in our extended family, I was Nathaniel, though Dad and Katie half the time just called me Nate; behind this door, I was simply the other half of Katie's perimeter.

Katie slipped inside, her long, straight platinum-blonde hair swinging past her shoulders as she pulled the door shut behind her until the latch clicked. We didn't need to explain to anyone else why we had a password for a room ten feet away from her own bedroom down the hall. Out in the rest of the house, the afternoon air was already heavy—Mom had locked her bedroom door at two o'clock with another headache and a glass from the kitchen cabinet, and Dad wouldn't be home from work until five-thirty to start dinner. Behind my closed door, however, the rules belonged entirely to the two of us.

I rushed back across the carpet and pressed the power button on the front of the television and the cable converter box just as the Majestic Studios castle logo and the afternoon cartoon block bumper flashed across the curved glass tube.

The opening brass fanfare of the Galactic Samurai Geckos theme song burst out of the small speaker grille, and instantly, both of us got completely carried away. Katie grabbed both of my hands, and for the next sixty seconds we bounced on the balls of our feet in the middle of the carpet, belting out every single word of the intro theme in unison while the animated title cards rolled across the screen.

Then, just as quickly, the final drumbeat of the opening theme faded out, the episode title card appeared, and the two of us were brought gently back to earth.

Without letting go of my hand, Katie climbed up onto the sofa cushions right beside me and wrapped both of her arms tightly around my ribs, resting her cheek against my shoulder. I adjusted the volume knob down two notches so the dialogue wouldn't echo into the hallway, wrapped both of my arms around my twin sister in a close, steady embrace, and let the deep, familiar pressure of holding each other anchor us in place while the afternoon cartoons glowed across the quiet room.

Summer Camp at Virginia Dominion University

The Parallel Pair: Dominion Mall & The VDU Fieldhouse

Date: 1994-07-12 at 08:45 America/New_York

8:45 AM — Two Pairs on Dominion Mall

"All right, Youth Division, let's buddy up in two lines for the walk across Dominion Mall!" Counselor Brad announced over the splash of the circular concrete plaza fountain, tapping his wooden clipboard with a grin.

Standing on the wide, sun-bleached concrete plaza of Virginia Dominion University in Norfolk at eight-forty-five in the morning, wearing matching royal-blue VDU Summer Camp t-shirts over our shorts, Katie immediately tightened her fingers around my right wrist. When our dad, David Prairie, had signed the two of us up for this two-week, all-day camp block—running from nine o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon—he had wanted to keep us safely out of the house in July while he was at work. Katie and I had our own rule for surviving six hours a day around fifteen noisy, unfamiliar kids: we were not letting go of each other.

Two paces ahead of us in the Youth Division line, I noticed we weren't the only brother and sister operating on that exact protocol.

A nine-year-old boy with reddish-blond hair and wire-rimmed glasses—whose name tag read Michael—and his seven-year-old sister Rachel, who had dark shoulder-length hair and glasses of her own, were standing hip-to-hip with their fingers laced together in a white-knuckled grip while their fourteen-year-old sister adjusted her backpack beside them before heading over to the Senior Division group. Just like Katie and me, Michael and Rachel didn't care about the cartoons or baseball cards the other campers were shouting about; they were holding onto each other like their lives depended on it.

Naturally, the two college-age counselors running our Youth Division—Counselor Brad and Counselor Kelly—looked at the four of us and reached the exact wrong conclusion.

"Look at this—we've got two brothers and two sisters right next to each other!" Brad called out brightly. "Let's mix it up today so the boys can hang out with the boys and the girls can hang out with the girls! Michael, step right back here and pair up with Nathaniel! And Rachel, you team up with Katie!"

Before I could protest, Brad guided me a step forward beside Michael, while Kelly gently steered Katie two steps back beside Rachel.

For four seconds, the counselors' geometry held.

I looked sideways at Michael through the thick Tidewater humidity. Michael looked sideways at me behind his wire-rimmed glasses. Neither of us had anything against the other—in fact, I could tell in half a heartbeat that his brain hated the sudden change in the line just as much as mine did. Behind us, Katie wasn't saying a word to Rachel, and Rachel wasn't saying a word to Katie; both of our sisters were staring straight at the backs of our blue camp shirts with their shoulders stiff and their jaws locked tight.

Michael and I didn't need to say a single word out loud. As soon as Counselor Brad turned his back and held his clipboard up in the air to lead the group across the light-gray concrete squares of Dominion Mall, Michael gave me a tiny, solemn nod, and I nodded right back.

I stepped half a pace to my left. Michael stepped half a pace to his right. In the exact same motion, Katie slipped forward to grab my hand again, and Rachel stepped right back into place on Michael's left flank.

By the time our sneakers clicked across the second concrete expansion joint past the circular fountain toward the precast-concrete and blue-glass facade of the University Library, the boy-and-girl experiment was completely over. It was brother and sister on the left, and twin brother and twin sister on the right.

9:30 AM — Terminal 4 and Terminal 5

At nine-thirty, the counselors ushered us out of the ninety-degree heat into the sixty-eight-degree air conditioning of the university computer lab.

Thirty beige desktop towers running Quantum OS and curved CRT monitors lined the walls, their cooling fans humming in a low, steady chord behind rows of mechanical KeyMech keyboards. I loved computers almost as much as I loved our afternoon cartoons, and Katie loved sitting beside me while we took turns with the mouse and keyboard.

Counselor Brad, however, still hadn't given up on his clipboard chart.

"Okay, campers, listen up!" Brad called out from the front desk, holding up a plastic tray of 3.5-inch floppy disks. "Boys on the left wall row—we've got Wagon Train West and Where on the Map Is Scarlet Devereaux? loaded up! Girls on the right wall row for Digit Chompers and PixelPaint Junior!"

Brad pointed Michael to Terminal 4 and guided me into the rolling plastic chair right next to him at Terminal 5. Across the blue carpet, Counselor Kelly led Rachel and Katie to Terminals 19 and 20 against the opposite wall.

The moment Katie's hand left my wrist, the hum of the computer lab stopped feeling calming and started feeling like a trap. Down the row to our left, a boy in a basketball cap was pounding his mechanical spacebar with both thumbs and yelling at the screen as his wagon sank in a river. I didn't touch my keyboard at Terminal 5. Instead, I twisted halfway around in my plastic chair and looked straight across the center aisle.

At Terminal 20, Katie was sitting completely motionless in front of the flashing five-by-five number grid of Digit Chompers, twisting the hem of her royal-blue camp shirt around her fingers while looking back across the carpet at me. Right beside her at Terminal 19, Rachel Ragsdale had pulled both hands off her desk and tucked her knuckles tightly against her chest.

Next to me at Terminal 4, Michael pushed his chair back six inches and looked at his sister. At the exact same moment, I tapped the open corner of my desk at Terminal 5 and motioned to Katie.

While Brad was kneeling beside the dot-matrix printer at the front of the room, Katie and Rachel slid off their chairs in perfect synchronization and walked three quiet steps side by side across the carpet.

Rachel squeezed onto the right half of Michael's seat at Terminal 4, and Katie pulled the empty rolling chair from the end of the row right up against my right side at Terminal 5, her long platinum-blonde hair brushing my sleeve as she exhaled a long, quiet breath of relief.

"Hey, girls, your computers are still running over on the right wall—" Counselor Kelly started, walking down the aisle before stopping short as she took in the two identical brother-and-sister teams sitting shoulder-to-shoulder at Terminals 4 and 5.

“She’s playing with me,” Michael told her quietly from Terminal 4, his left hand resting on the arrow keys while Rachel’s right thumb hovered over the spacebar for Digit Chompers. “I steer the square, and Rachel chomps the multiples. That’s how we play.”

I rested my left hand on the keyboard of Terminal 5 and placed Katie’s hand over the beige two-button mouse for Wagon Train West.

“Katie’s my twin,” I said, looking up at Kelly with quiet, unshakable certainty. “We always play together.”

Kelly looked from Michael and Rachel to Katie and me. Neither pair was making noise, neither pair was arguing, and the panicked stiffness had vanished from all four of us the second the sisters were back beside their brothers. Slowly, Kelly smiled, pulled an extra chair over for Rachel so both pairs had two seats pushed flush together, and jotted a quick note on her clipboard.

“Okay,” Kelly said gently. “Michael and Rachel on Terminal 4, Nathaniel and Katie on Terminal 5.”

For the next hour and a half, Katie and I guided our pixel wagon all the way across the western rivers without losing a single ox—trading turns with the mouse while Michael and Rachel cleared screen after screen of Digit Chompers two feet to our left.

1:30 PM — Pair 1 and Pair 2 at the Fieldhouse Pool

After eating our grilled cheese sandwiches side by side in the Monarch Commons dining hall at noon—just a few seats down from where Michael and Rachel’s fourteen-year-old sister Jessica used her written lunch exception on the camp roster to sit with them and quiz them on campus landmarks—our group walked down Hampton Boulevard to the VDU Fieldhouse.

The Fieldhouse was a massive brick athletic building where the Lady Admirals played women’s basketball during the school year while the men’s team played downtown under the concrete dome of the Norfolk Prism. Down the rubber-floored hallway, through the double doors of the Fieldhouse Natatorium, the indoor swimming pool echoed with splashing water and bouncing whistles.

As soon as I stepped out of the boys’ locker room in my swim trunks, Katie stepped out of the girls’ locker room door in her navy one-piece swimsuit, walked straight across the wet white tile, and grabbed my hand with both of hers. Right next to us on the bench, Rachel Ragsdale did the exact same thing with Michael.

Up on the deck beside the white plastic Buddy Board, Counselor Brad held up his thick black grease pencil and tried the gender split one last time.

“Every fifteen minutes when the lifeguard blows the long whistle and yells Buddy Check, you and your buddy have to find each other in the shallow end, grab hands, and hold them up in the air!” Brad called out over the echoing cavern. “Michael and Nathaniel, you guys are Pair Four! Rachel and Katie, you two are Pair Nine!”

Katie squeezed my fingers tightly as thirty kids splashed into the pool at once. I didn't let go of her hand, and four feet to my left, Michael didn't let go of Rachel's. Together, both pairs walked down the wide fiberglass steps into the warm, three-foot shallow end along the side wall.

Two minutes later, the head lifeguard on the high white chair raised his silver whistle to his lips.

TWEEEEET!

"BUDDY CHECK!" the lifeguard shouted through his red megaphone. "Find your buddy and hands in the air!"

Out in the middle of the shallow end, kids who had been chasing each other in Admirals and Anchors pool tag splashed around in circles trying to remember who their assigned partner was.

Along the shallow wall, Katie's left hand was already laced tightly through my right hand, and Rachel's right hand was already laced tightly through Michael's left. Before the whistle had even stopped echoing off the steel roof trusses of the Fieldhouse, all four of us raised our joined hands straight into the air above the water.

Up on the deck, Counselor Brad stared at our two pairs of raised brother-and-sister hands, looked at Counselor Kelly laughing softly behind her clipboard, and finally surrendered. Wiping his rag across the grease pencil on the white plastic board, Brad wrote two new permanent assignments at the very top of the list:

PAIR 1: MICHAEL + RACHEL PAIR 2: NATHANIEL + KATIE

Katie looked at me as we lowered our arms back into the warm water, a bright, triumphant smile breaking across her face, and across the lane Michael and Rachel shared the exact same quiet grin. For the rest of the two-week camp block—from the morning walk across Dominion Mall to afternoon Four-in-a-Row Grid and Wild Draw cards in the Fieldhouse multipurpose room—nobody at Virginia Dominion University ever tried to separate either pair of siblings again.

Big Family Christmas

The Newport News ARTS Train & The Downstairs Sofa Bed

Date: 1994-12-23 at 18:15 America/New_York

6:15 PM — The Newport News ARTS Platform

The evening train pulled into the brick ARTS—American Rail Transit Service—station in Newport News with a long hiss of air brakes and a cloud of white steam rising into the cold December air.

Up on the concrete platform, Katie and I stood side by side in our winter coats with our hands tucked into our pockets, watching the stainless-steel ARTS passenger doors slide open at the end of the all-day southbound train run down from New England. Moments later, our paternal grandmother—Dad and Aunt Liz's mother—stepped down onto the platform from Newport, Rhode Island alongside our Aunt Elizabeth and our twelve-year-old cousin Chelsea, Aunt Liz's developmentally disabled daughter who was three years older than us, carrying their holiday suitcases as the whole family crowded together to exchange hugs and greetings.

True to form, before we had even walked ten feet past the station canopy toward the parking lot, Aunt Elizabeth wasted no time digging into her coat pocket and lighting up a cigarette.

Beside us, Chelsea immediately scowled and angrily plugged her nose with two fingers.

"Mom, that's gross," Chelsea stammered, waving a hand in front of her face as all of us were forced to stand on the cold curb waiting before we could load into the vehicles.

"Liz, put that out," our dad snapped, his breath fogging in the December chill as he hefted two suitcases into the trunk of our Holt sedan. "You know damn well that's not good for you!"

"Alright, alright," Aunt Liz snapped back, stubbing the cigarette out on the heel of her boot as we sorted ourselves into the two vehicles for the drive back across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel.

Chelsea climbed into the middle of the back bench seat of the Holt sedan right between Katie and me, while Dad and Aunt Liz sat up front. Behind us, Mom—who was having a rare sober evening so Grandma wouldn't ask questions at the ARTS station—drove Grandma in the pickup truck following our taillights down Interstate 64.

As soon as our sedan cleared the tunnel and turned onto the familiar streets of Virginia Beach, Katie leaned forward slightly to look across Chelsea at me, her eyes bright with holiday excitement.

"Welcome to Virginia Beach!" Katie squealed happily, squeezing Chelsea's mittened hand. "Now, the three of us are going to have to squeeze into one room!"

8:00 PM — Downstairs Sanctuary

When we pulled into the driveway at home, Katie, Chelsea, and I pitched in right away to help Grandma and Aunt Liz carry their overnight bags through the front door.

Standing at the foot of the stairs in the foyer, Dad laid out the holiday room assignments.

"You three will share the sofa bed," Dad said to us kids, gesturing toward the living room. Turning to the adults, he added, "Mom, Katie's room is closer to the upstairs bathroom. Liz, you get Nathaniel's room."

In a lot of houses, getting evicted from both of our upstairs bedrooms for the holidays would have felt like a punishment. To Katie and me, however, Dad had just handed us the greatest logistical gift of Christmas. With Grandma in Katie's room,

Aunt Liz in my room, and Mom and Dad behind their closed door at the end of the upstairs hall, all four adults were confined to the second floor—which meant the entire first floor belonged exclusively to the three of us kids.

“Chelsea, there’s a bathroom down here we can use,” Katie explained immediately, pointing down the short hallway off the living room. “It has a shower. We can stay downstairs while the adults are upstairs.”

“Okay,” our cousin replied, setting her backpack by the couch. “Where do we sleep?”

“The three of us will sleep down here. This sofa is a sofa bed,” Katie replied proudly as the three of us finished carrying the last of the adults’ bags up the stairs.

Because the train had arrived late in the evening, dinner was fast and simple—warm bowls of soup and buttered rolls around the dining table—and before nine o’clock, the adults retreated upstairs for the night, leaving the first floor completely to the three of us.

“I want to take a shower,” Chelsea announced to Katie and me once the upstairs footsteps quieted down.

Katie walked her down the short hall to show her how to turn the downstairs shower faucet on and where the clean towels were stacked, then came back out into the living room where I had already changed into my long-sleeved flannel pajamas and was busy pulling the heavy metal frame of the sofa bed out from inside the couch. Working together, Katie and I unfolded the mattress, smoothed out the clean cotton sheets, and spread two thick winter quilts across the top.

A few minutes later, the bathroom door clicked open. Instead of putting her pajamas on inside the bathroom, Chelsea wandered straight out into the living room wrapped only in a bath towel, making her way casually toward the sofa bed Katie and I had just finished setting up.

“CHELSEA!” Katie stammered, her hand shooting out in a flash to clamp firmly over my eyes. “Your cousin shouldn’t be seeing all of you!”

Before Chelsea could even blink, Katie spun her right back around by the shoulders and shunted her straight back into the downstairs bathroom to finish drying off and put her flannel pajamas on properly.

“You need to stop blushing,” my twin sister admonished me once the bathroom door clicked shut behind Chelsea—except she didn’t truly admonish me at all, letting out a quiet, bubbly giggle as she took her hand off my face. “You promise not to tell anyone?”

“Promise,” I replied, rubbing the bridge of my nose as we both climbed onto the left side of the wide sofa bed in our flannel pajamas and pulled the heavy winter quilt up to our chins.

“You know Chelsea sometimes forgets the rules when she’s in a different house,” Katie whispered, leaning her head against my shoulder underneath the quilt and lacing her fingers through mine. “As long as we look out for each other down here, nobody upstairs is going to yell at anyone.”

“Not a word to anyone,” I whispered back, squeezing her hand.

Two minutes later, Chelsea came back out of the hallway wearing her full green flannel pajamas, fuzzy socks, and a sheepish grin, and climbed under the quilt on the far side of the sofa bed. With the living room lamp clicked off and only the colored lights of the Christmas tree glowing softly in the corner, Katie stayed tucked right against my side—the two of us holding down our downstairs sanctuary while the winter wind rattled the front windows.

Middle School & The Blizzard of ’96

The Blizzard of ’96

Snow Day in Virginia Beach & The Backyard Promise

Date: 1996-01-06 at 11:30 America/New_York

11:30 AM — Waiting for the First Flakes

“You think we’re going to have snow?” Katie asked, her breath fogging a small circle on the cold glass pane as the two of us stood shoulder to shoulder at my upstairs bedroom window.

“Hope so. SNOW DAY!” I said, practically vibrating with excitement as I pressed my palms against the wooden sill and looked out at our residential street in Virginia Beach.

Outside on the first Saturday of January 1996, it was bitterly cold, and heavy, slate-gray clouds were rolling in off the Atlantic until the sky looked like brushed steel. Behind us on my bedroom stand, the local Norfolk GBS news station had cut into regular Saturday morning programming, the meteorologist standing in front of a swirling radar map warning all of Hampton Roads to prepare for the Blizzard of ’96. Even on a Saturday, a real blizzard meant Monday and Tuesday would be wiped clean off the school calendar.

“Snow,” Katie replied hopefully, leaning her shoulder against mine as the news anchor continued to drone on and on about wind gusts, coastal flooding, and how many inches were expected later in the afternoon. Both of us were thrilled at the thought of the whole neighborhood shutting down.

At twelve-thirty, while Katie and I were sitting side by side at the kitchen table eating our lunch sandwiches, the first white flakes began to drift past the dining room window. At first it wasn’t much—just fine, powdery crystals swirling across the dry grass—but within twenty minutes the flakes grew thick and steady, dusting the wooden fence rails and the roof of Dad’s car.

“Wonder if it will stick,” Katie giggled, pointing her finger toward the patio.

By late afternoon, it didn't just stick; it buried the entire backyard under a clean, silent blanket of white.

Inside the house, however, the quiet didn't last. Around five o'clock, the familiar, sharp sound of Mom's and Dad's voices started rising from the upstairs hallway—first a slammed cabinet door, then the bitter, overlapping shouting match that always followed whenever Dad found another empty bottle hidden behind the pantry cans.

5:45 PM — The Backyard Bear Hug

Katie and I didn't wait for the yelling to reach the staircase. We pulled on our heavy winter jackets and boots and slipped out the back door into the twilight snow.

Out in the backyard, inside the perimeter of our white wooden picket fence, the falling snow acted like a giant acoustic blanket over the neighborhood. The streetlamps glowed pale orange through the swirling flakes, and every footstep made a soft, muted crunch under our shoes.

Standing near the center of the yard with the snow settling onto my short blonde hair, the cold wind hit my face, and all at once the weight of everything we had been carrying over the past year caught up with me. My chest tightened, and before I could stop myself, I started sniffling in the cold air.

Katie turned around immediately. She didn't hesitate for a second—she stepped straight through the snow and pulled me into a tight, fierce bear hug, wrapping both of her blue-jacketed arms around my shoulders.

"What's wrong?" Katie asked softly against my ear, holding onto me with all her strength.

"I'm just so happy you're willing to do all of this for me," I whispered into her shoulder, my voice shaking slightly as I held onto the back of her winter coat, unsure of how to put the rest of the knot in my chest into words.

Katie didn't need me to explain it. Because she was my twin, she already knew the exact two things crushing my ribs.

"You're still upset with last year, and that girl everyone thought you had a crush on?" Katie asked gently.

"Yes, I am," I whimpered, burying my face against her collar, overwhelmingly grateful that my twin sister was hugging me instead of telling me to toughen up. All through the previous spring at school, a pack of kids in our grade had latched onto a rumor that I had a crush on a girl in our homeroom, turning every hallway change and cafeteria period into a relentless, mocking gauntlet that wouldn't stop no matter what I said. "And it does not help that Mom and Dad are arguing with each other again. I just want to enjoy the snow without the screaming."

"I'm right here, and I will never leave you," Katie replied fiercely, pulling me into an even tighter bear hug as the heavy January snow came down all around us in the twilight. "I'm your sister, and I would just never, ever leave you."

She held onto me for a long moment in the quiet yard, letting the steady pressure of her arms slow my breathing down, before she spoke again.

“Your classmates are mean,” Katie continued, her voice firm against the cold wind. “Especially when they refuse to back down. When we go back to school, I will gladly play my part of pretend girlfriend so they leave you alone.”

“Thank you, but I think everyone knows that you’re my sister,” I whispered, managing a small, shaky laugh even as my teeth started chattering from the twenty-degree air.

“Come on, let’s head back inside before we freeze,” Katie said, taking my hand and leading me back across the snow-covered grass toward the back door.

Inside the warm kitchen, the shouting upstairs had finally stopped—Mom had gone to bed for the night, and the house was still again. Standing beside the dark green laminate counter with the snow piling up against the dining room window glass behind us, Katie wrapped her arms around my neck for one more long, warming hug until the chill left my fingers.

“Let’s use my bed tonight,” I whispered as we started walking up the stairs together. “This way we can see the street from my window when we wake up in the morning.”

“Sure,” Katie smiled. “I hope we wake up to snow on the ground like there is right now.”

At the top of the landing, I paused outside my bedroom door and looked at her. “Real quick, if you’re going to spend the night with me: what should we do about getting changed?”

“I’ll go change into my warm pajamas in my room and grab my pillow, and I’ll knock when I’m ready,” Katie whispered with a practical nod.

Three minutes later, after I had pulled on my own heavy winter flannel pajamas and climbed under the covers by the window, three quiet knocks sounded against my door.

“Cartoons are for life,” Katie whispered from the hall.

“Come on in,” I whispered back.

Carrying her pillow under her arm in her purple fleece pajamas, Katie crossed the carpet and climbed under the heavy blanket right at my side. Outside my bedroom window, the Blizzard of ’96 howled silently across Virginia Beach, piling deep drifts against the curb under the glow of the streetlamp, while inside the warm perimeter of my bed, my twin sister and I fell fast asleep holding hands.

Katie Is Dumped

No More Fighting & The Dinner Dance Promise

Date: 1997-10-16 at 16:15 America/New_York

4:15 PM — Tears Under the Blue Butterfly

“Leave me alone! You’d never understand,” Katie sobbed, turning her head half away as I pushed her bedroom door open and stepped onto the carpet.

I had just walked up the stairs after seventh grade when I heard the sound echoing right through her hollow wooden door into the upstairs hallway. Katie was standing near the foot of her bed against the bright magenta-purple wall beneath her framed blue morpho butterfly print, crying up a storm with her shoulders shaking inside her dark navy t-shirt and both hands pressed over her face.

For the first month of middle school—while I spent my afternoons quiet in my blue bedroom with my Nova 64 video games and Katie tried her hardest to fit in with the girls from her English class and a seventh-grade boy named Donnie—the stress of the loud hallways and Mom’s worsening drinking at home had pushed the two of us into the stupid habit of bickering whenever we passed each other in the hall.

Hearing the ragged sound of her crying, I dropped every trace of that irritation at the door. Stepping quietly across her room, I placed my hand gently on her shoulder.

“What is it?” I asked softly.

Katie continued sobbing for several seconds, her chest heaving as she tried to catch her breath. I realized immediately that this wasn’t a small hallway argument—this was serious. It took her a long moment to realize that I wasn’t going to tease her or make fun of her for crying.

Slowly, she lowered her hands from her tear-streaked face.

“Donnie dumped me,” Katie choked out, fresh tears spilling down her cheeks. “I loved him, and he dumped me!”

I reached my hand out to gently wipe the tears from her eyes. Never having had a girlfriend myself—and never having been dumped—I didn’t fully understand the mechanics of middle-school romance, but I didn’t need to understand romance to see how badly my twin sister was hurting.

Katie reached out with both hands and took mine, holding onto my fingers tightly as if she were drowning and I was the only solid ground in the room.

“Please… don’t let go,” she whispered, her voice raw.

I closed both of my hands around hers and held on firmly. Looking straight into my eyes with a sudden, desperate seriousness, Katie asked the question that mattered most to survival in a middle-school cafeteria:

“Will you sit with me at lunch?”

The look on Katie’s upset face told me the only answer she needed to hear—and it was the exact answer I wanted to give her anyway.

“Yes,” I answered without hesitation. “I’ll sit with you at lunch.”

Katie burst into fresh tears of pure relief, letting go of my fingers only to throw both arms around my neck and pull me into a tight hug.

“Thank you,” she whispered against my shoulder.

I could hear how raspy and sore her throat was from all of her crying, so I offered to run downstairs and get her a cold glass of water, but she shook her head and held onto my shirt even tighter. As I wrapped my arms around her waist and hugged her back in the quiet room, I felt something shift permanently inside my chest. All the petty squabbling we had done over the past few weeks felt completely, utterly stupid. Katie didn’t want to stop hugging me, and I didn’t have a single problem with that.

“Please, no more fighting,” my sister sobbed softly into my shoulder.

“I understand,” I promised, resting my chin against the top of her blonde hair as we continued to hold onto each other.

“I’m still upset, but thanks for this,” Katie murmured a minute later as I felt a few more warm tears soak into the shoulder of my maroon t-shirt.

“Katie, I’m here for you,” I told her. And as I said the words out loud, squeezing my arms around my twin sister, I realized just how much more I loved hugging her and keeping her safe than arguing with her.

5:00 PM — The Pretend Date & PB&J Sanctuary

When her crying finally began to subside, the two of us sat down side by side on the edge of her green-and-gold patterned bedspread, our shoulders pressed together and our hands still linked.

“Thank you,” Katie said quietly, wiping her eyes with the back of her wrist. “Thank you for being there for me. Someday, I know I’m going to repay this.”

She went quiet for a beat, looking down at our joined hands, before she suddenly whispered:

“Take me to the Dinner Dance this week.”

The seventh-grade Dinner Dance was tomorrow night in the school cafeteria, and half the reason Katie had been crying so hard was the thought of either staying home alone in embarrassment or walking into that room by herself while Donnie was there.

“Of course we can go together,” I said immediately, knowing I didn’t have a date of my own—and wouldn’t have wanted to go with anyone else even if I did. “Even though you’re my sister, we will go on a pretend date.”

“Oh, thank you. Thank you,” Katie breathed, the last of the heavy sobs finally leaving her chest as she leaned her head against my shoulder.

“Would you like it if I made you dinner tonight?” I asked, deciding right then and there to start playing my part as her protective pretend boyfriend.

“Let’s just have something simple, like sandwiches,” she said softly.

“Alright,” I replied, giving her hand a gentle squeeze as the two of us stood up and headed downstairs together.

In the quiet kitchen, I made us both thick peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches and poured two tall glasses of cold milk to soothe her sore throat. After we finished eating at the table, Katie looked across at me.

“Could we watch a movie together?” she asked.

“Sure,” I replied warmly. “Let’s pick something together.”

We walked back upstairs to my deep-blue bedroom, picked out our VHS tape of House Guard 2: Lost in Manhattan from the shelf beneath my television stand, and pushed it into the VCR. As the opening Majestic Studios credits began to roll across the CRT screen, Katie kicked off her shoes and climbed into my single bed right at my side, resting her head on my shoulder and pulling the blanket across our legs.

Near the end of the movie, when the closing music faded in, I glanced down and saw that my sister was fast asleep against my arm, her breathing slow and completely peaceful after an afternoon of crying her eyes out.

I reached carefully for the remote, clicked the television off, and decided right then to let her sleep. I decided that I would tell her that I didn’t mind after we woke up in the morning. Katie was exhausted, and the last thing I wanted was to see her become a grouch because she was woken back up without enough sleep. Part of me marveled at how natural it felt sharing my narrow bed with my twin sister again—just like we had during the Blizzard of ’96 and on the downstairs sofa bed at Christmas. We had chosen this close brother-and-sister bond together, and enjoying the warm, quiet company of the person who mattered most to me in the world, I slid down onto the pillow beside her and let myself drift off to sleep at her side.

The Pretend Boyfriend & Twins’ Day

Twin Brothers Always Stay: Spirit Week & The Living Room Sofa

Date: 1997-10-17 at 07:30 America/New_York

7:30 AM — “Twin Brothers Always Stay”

The next morning, when the pale autumn sunlight filtered through the blinds of my bedroom, I woke up first—and sure enough, Katie was still fast asleep right at my side in the small bed.

“Katie,” I whispered softly, gently prodding her shoulder so I wouldn’t startle her in case she didn’t realize right away that she had fallen asleep in my room the night before.

My sister stirred against the pillow, blinking her blue eyes open in the quiet blue room before looking from the wall to me in mild surprise.

“Morning, sleepyhead,” I whispered with a small smile.

“I slept in your bed?” she asked groggily, rubbing her eyes.

“Yep, and I did not mind,” I replied, looking her straight in the eye. “Let’s play a game together.”

For the first time since Donnie had broken her heart yesterday afternoon, Katie’s face lit up with genuine excitement. While she sat up against the headboard, I slipped out of bed, walked across the carpet to the television stand, and powered on my Nova 64 video game console. I was still in full protective-brother mode, determined to keep cheering her up until I heard her laugh again.

Before I picked up the controller, I turned back to face her.

“I’m your brother. I will always be here for you. Promise,” I told her, my voice steady and earnest in the quiet room. I paused for half a beat, then added the truth I knew we would live by for the rest of our lives: “Boyfriends come and go, but Twin Brothers always stay. Always.”

Before the console title screen had even finished loading on the CRT television, I found myself wrapped in Katie’s arms again. She stood up from the edge of the mattress and hugged me with everything she had, making it unmistakably clear that she had no intention of letting go of me. She held onto my shoulders while the video game rolled through its opening demo sequence on the screen behind us, then sat down on the carpet right at my side.

“We should probably get dressed,” Katie said after a moment, glancing down at her wrinkled shirt from yesterday. “Guess I will pop into my room real quick. Leave the game on this screen while we get dressed?”

“Sure,” I replied, gently ushering her to the bedroom door. “I’ll open my door when I’m dressed.”

8:00 AM — Spirit Week: Twins’ Day

Five minutes later, after I had pulled on a clean maroon short-sleeve t-shirt, medium-wash blue jeans, and my tan sneakers, I opened my bedroom door. Katie walked right back in from across the hall—and the second I saw what she had picked out of her closet, I had to grin.

Without planning it, she had put on the exact same shade of maroon short-sleeve t-shirt and medium-wash blue jeans with a dark belt.

“Next week is Spirit Week at school,” I said as she stepped into the room. “Want to have a little fun on Twins’ Day, since, well, we are twins?”

Katie giggled as I handed her the second black controller from the floor stand. “Yeah, we are twins! Wonder how many others will really be twins compared to how many will do it just for fun.”

We both laughed out loud at that remark, and right there in front of my computer desk and television stand, we stubbornly made up our minds.

“I think it’s settled, then,” I declared. “We will dress exactly the same, and we will enter the contest.”

We laughed again, already looking forward to seeing how the teachers and our classmates would react to actual fraternal twins walking into the Spirit Week Twins’ Day assembly dressed identically and holding hands.

“Too bad we don’t have matching shoes,” Katie remarked, looking down at her grey-and-red sneakers next to my tan ones.

“Ah, well. Still, let’s do what we can. I think these pants and shirts look close enough,” I said, setting the controllers on the desk and pulling her into another tight, standing hug in the middle of the room. Both of us laughed into each other’s shoulders, our matching maroon sleeves wrapped around each other’s backs. Yesterday’s tears were completely gone.

5:30 PM — Macaroni & Cheese on the Living Room Sofa

Later that evening, after spending the afternoon practicing our co-op levels and getting ready for the weekend, Katie and I walked downstairs and decided to sit together on the tan-brown living room sofa, curling up side by side while we waited for dinner to be made.

As usual in our house, Dad was in the kitchen working over the stove after a full day at his job, while upstairs Mom was already passed out drunk in bed behind her closed door.

“Mac and cheese is what I smell,” I whispered as Katie slid flush against my right side on the sofa cushions, draped her left arm warmly around my shoulders, and rested her right hand across my forearm to hold me close to her.

“Our favorite,” she replied softly, resting her cheek near my shoulder as the two of us sat there, happily snuggled up together beneath the blue-framed underwater painting on the living room wall.

We had a few quiet minutes to ourselves before the timer on the stove went off, and neither of us wanted to get off the sofa. After years of feeling like we had to keep our guard up against loud classrooms and the unpredictable storms upstairs, snuggling together on the couch felt like the safest, most comfortable place on earth.

As we sat there in the warm glow of the living room lamp, Katie whispered, “Snuggling up is just so comfortable.”

“It is,” I replied quietly, leaning into the warmth of her arm around my shoulders. Neither of us moved an inch; we were both completely content holding onto each other and letting the rest of the house fade away.

A few minutes later, Dad stepped to the doorway of the dining room with a pot holder in his hand, looking over at the two of us curled up together on the couch before calling us in to eat.

When we sat down side by side at the dining table over our steaming bowls of macaroni and cheese, Dad looked across the table at the two of us, his tired eyes softening with genuine gratitude.

“I really appreciate that you both don’t fight and argue with each other,” Dad said quietly, his voice heavy with emotion. “Honestly, I wish your mother didn’t drink her life away. I want to do my best to not only be your father, but also be a proper dad to both of you. Your mother’s drinking is not your fault, and I don’t want either of you to think that. Please don’t let your grades suffer because of it.”

Underneath the edge of the dining table, Katie reached her hand over and laced her fingers tightly through mine, and I squeezed right back. Whatever happened upstairs, and whatever happened in the hallways at school, my twin sister and I had our sanctuary—and we were never letting go.

Sixteen & Summer Sanctuary

Bonding With My Sister

Summer Sanctuary: Hearthstone Pizza, The Sunlit Valley, & Katie’s Room

Date: 2001-06-18 at 08:30 America/New_York

8:30 AM — First Full Day of Summer

“Summer is here,” I said, blinking open my eyes as the warm June sunlight filtered through the blinds of Katie’s bedroom.

“Our first full day with the house to ourselves,” my sister replied softly as we started waking up.

Having both turned sixteen back on April eighth, the two of us were curled up side by side in our pajamas on top of her green-and-gold patterned bedspread beneath the framed blue morpho butterfly artwork hanging on her magenta-purple wall, completely used to being pretend dates and full-time anchors for each other. With both of our parents already gone for their morning shifts and two quiet weeks stretching ahead of us before Summer School started, the entire house was finally calm.

Katie rubbed her eyes, then looked over at me and asked, “Get dressed and have breakfast?”

“Sure, I am getting hungry,” I replied, giving her hand a quick squeeze as I climbed out of bed.

I stepped across the upstairs hallway into my own deep-blue painted bedroom to pull on a clean maroon crew-neck t-shirt and jeans while Katie changed in her room, and two minutes later we met right back at her doorway, exchanging a warm, familiar smile before making our way down the stairs together.

“Let’s just have some cereal, then we will figure out what we want to do for the day,” I said as we reached the bottom landing. “I want to spend the day with just you.”

Our stomachs were calling us, as was our daily routine of taking our morning dose of medication before the day got underway. In the quiet kitchen, I pulled two ceramic bowls out from the cupboard and set our morning medication tablets beside two glasses of water while we picked out our cereal from the pantry—being twins, of course it was the exact same box—and sat down at the kitchen table, pulling our chairs right up against each other so we were as close as possible.

After we took our morning medication and started on our cereal, my twin sister reached across the table, took my hand, and looked straight into my eyes.

“What would you like to do today?” Katie asked.

“I was thinking of snuggling on the sofa over a movie,” I suggested as we continued eating our breakfast side by side.

“I know just the movie I want to watch,” my sister said, squeezing my hand. She gave me that unmistakable look like she had a big secret and started giggling. She wanted me to ask what movie it was, but after sixteen years as her twin brother, I knew she wouldn’t tell me—I would have to wait and see what it was when she popped the tape into the VCR.

Since I had made breakfast, Katie took it upon herself to carry our bowls and spoons over to the counter and load our dishes into the dishwasher.

“I will get the tape, then will join you on the sofa,” Katie called over her shoulder as I headed toward the living room.

“Alright, Katie,” I replied, settling onto the cushions of our tan-brown living room sofa beside the coffee table, where Dad had neatly stacked the slightly outdated Quantum Basic 5.0 programming textbooks—complete with clear plastic mylar covers and barcode stickers on the spines—that he had checked out from the Virginia Beach Public Library to get a head start on his upcoming fall Quantum Basic 6.0 class at the Community College of Hampton Roads—CCHR. Over the past few weeks, Katie had started reading Dad’s library books cover to cover and teaching the programming exercises to me, and when Dad found out, he had beamed with pride and actively encouraged both of us to keep coding.

Even better, when Summer School started in two weeks, Katie and I weren’t going because we were behind. We had intentionally signed up to knock out an academic credit over the summer so that when our main high-school year started in September, our schedules would line up with a free period and lunch block together every single day. Until those summer classes began, I was looking forward to having unbroken time with my twin sister.

9:30 AM — Hearthstone Pizza & Journey to the Sunlit Valley

A minute later, Katie walked into the living room holding a familiar white clamshell VHS tape behind her back, slid the cassette into the VCR beneath the television, and walked over to sit on the sofa right next to me.

Immediately, she lifted her arm and made it clear she wanted me to snuggle up in her arms. I slid flush against her side and rested my head against her shoulder, glad that I got to curl up with Katie now that the two of us had become so close.

Across the room, the CRT television flickered to life. My eyes lit up as the sweeping orchestral welcome theme to one of our favorite companies—Majestic Studios—played across the screen, and then my eyes lit up even further as the previews transitioned and I recognized the exact childhood VHS movie that my sister had put on for us: Journey to the Sunlit Valley.

“I knew you would like it,” Katie whispered, resting her cheek against my hair as she looked down into my eyes.

“Of course,” I whispered back with a grin as the tape rolled through its iconic opening bumper before the feature presentation—the familiar, upbeat birthday party commercial from Hearthstone Pizza where the older brother was supposed to be nice to the little girl.

We happily stayed curled up together on the cushions as Sprout and his friends began their journey across the screen, wanting nothing more than to sit there quietly in each other’s arms watching the movie. Both of our parents were away at work, the house was completely peaceful, and we had decided that all we wanted was each other—just brother-and-sister time together in our sanctuary before Summer School was set to begin.

9:00 PM — Katie’s Room Beneath the Blue Butterfly

By the time evening rolled around and the June twilight faded outside the living room windows, we had spent the entire day side by side without a single argument, a single raised voice, or a single interruption from the outside world.

As we walked up the stairs together after dinner and paused on the second-floor landing between my blue-painted bedroom and her magenta-purple bedroom, Katie turned to me and took my hand.

“Share a bed?” Katie asked softly.

“Sure,” I replied without hesitation. “Your room or mine?”

“How about my room tonight,” Katie suggested with a gentle smile.

After I stepped into my blue room to brush my teeth and change into a comfortable t-shirt and flannel pajama pants, I crossed the hall and knocked lightly on Katie’s door. Inside her room, under the warm amber glow of the bedside lamp and the framed blue morpho butterfly on her wall, we climbed onto her bed together, propped our pillows against the headboard, and pulled the green-and-gold covers across our legs. Katie draped her arm around my shoulders and laced her fingers through mine, and as the house settled into quiet around us, we drifted off to sleep side by side.

End of Summer Cruise

Part 1: The I-95 Haul, The Quantum Basic Library Book, & Ditching Captain Barnaby

Date: 2001-08-19 at 09:30 America/New_York

Saturday, August 18, 2001 — The Twelve-Hour Grumble Down I-95

"If Command1_Click calls the subroutine before the text box validates, the whole form throws a type-mismatch error," Katie murmured beside me in the back seat of our Holt sedan, tapping her finger against page 142 of the thick paperback resting across our knees as another green Florida mileage sign flashed past the window on Interstate 95 South.

"That's only in Quantum Basic 5.0," our dad, David Prairie, called back from the driver's seat, his eyes flicking warmly to the rearview mirror despite the fatigue of ten straight hours behind the wheel. "Wait until we test it on the Quantum Basic 6.0 compiler at the CCHR lab next month. Though I'll be honest with you two—I'd a whole lot rather be sitting at our kitchen table in Virginia Beach testing that code right now than driving to Port Canaveral."

"So would we, Dad," I grumbled, shifting my stiff legs on the bench seat while Katie laced her left hand through my right.

None of the three of us—not Dad, not Katie, and not me—had wanted to go on this seven-day Caribbean cruise at the end of August. Back in July, Katie and I had worked hard through our high-school summer school class, knocking out a required academic credit early so that when eleventh grade started in September, our main school-year schedules would free up for a shared lunch block together every single day. All the three of us had wanted for the final two weeks of summer was to stay home in peace so Dad could study for his upcoming fall semester at the Community College of Hampton Roads—CCHR.

To get a head start before classes began, Dad had gone to the Virginia Beach Public Library and checked out the newest programming manual they had left on the shelf—a slightly outdated, dog-eared copy of Learn Quantum Basic 5.0 in 21 Days wrapped in a clear plastic mylar library jacket with a barcode sticker on the spine. Within forty-eight hours of Dad setting that book on the dining table, Katie had started reading it cover to cover and teaching the event loops and form layouts to me on my bedroom computer. When Dad caught us working through his library book together, he hadn't been upset at all; he had beamed with pride and started actively encouraging both of us to follow our dreams.

Up in the front passenger seat, however, our mother, Brenda, hadn't cared about Dad's CCHR classes, our summer school credit, or the fact that twelve hours crammed into a sedan was making Katie's and my legs ache from hip to ankle. Mom had insisted on booking this seven-day Eastern Caribbean cruise—and when we finally rolled over the causeway into Port Canaveral on Saturday afternoon, the visual irony hit Katie and me right through the windshield.

Docked at the premier terminal across the blue channel stood a gleaming, navy-and-gold Majestic Cruise Line ship, its twin funnels shining in the Florida sun.

We didn't turn into the Majestic terminal. Instead, Mom directed Dad toward Pier 3, where a boxy, bargain-rate mass-market ship called the M/S Sunward Tropics was loading passengers.

By four o'clock that afternoon, standing packed shoulder-to-shoulder in bulky orange foam lifejackets out on the humid teak planks of the Deck 4 Boat Promenade for the mandatory twenty-minute safety muster drill—with all of the ship's elevators shut off—I felt the first warning tremor shoot down both of my calves. Beside me, Katie was leaning almost her entire weight against my right arm just to keep her knees locked. Both of us had lived with mild cerebral palsy since birth, which had always made our balance uneven, but standing on that hot deck before climbing two flights of metal stairs back to our cramped inside cabin left our legs shaking and our arms strangely weak on the brass banisters in a way neither of us had ever felt before.

Dad walked right behind us up every step of the stairwell, one hand braced behind Katie's back and the other steadying my elbow, his brow furrowed with quiet concern as he watched how hard our arms were straining just to pull ourselves up the railing.

Sunday, August 19, 2001, 9:30 AM — Ditching Captain Barnaby for the Deck 8 CyberCafé

"Look at the two of you—you're going to be late for the character breakfast!" Mom snapped at nine-twenty on Sunday morning, shoving two neon-yellow "Camp Sunward Youth" lanyards and a printed activity sheet into Dad's hand before disappearing out the cabin door toward the Lido Pool Bar. "And I put Katie's name down for the two o'clock beginner ballet and ballroom workshop in the Starlight Lounge!"

Katie stared at the pink dance slip in horror, her fingers tightening around my wrist as the ship rolled gently on its first full day at sea heading toward Nassau.

"Come on," Dad said quietly, his jaw tight as he picked up his canvas backpack—with the Virginia Beach Public Library Quantum Basic 5.0 book tucked inside—and led Katie and me down the narrow corridor to the elevator. "Let's go see what your mother signed you up for."

Five minutes later, the three of us stood outside the double glass doors of the Starlight Lounge on Deck 6.

Inside, thirty screaming six- and seven-year-olds were banging plastic spoons against paper placemats while accordion music blared from the speakers. Waddling between the tables were two sweaty crew members zipped into bargain-bin polyester foam mascot suits—Captain Barnaby the Buccaneer Parrot and Salty the Starfish—whose faded fabric looked like it had been pulled out of a carnival trash bin.

At the podium by the door, a twenty-two-year-old youth counselor glanced down at her clipboard—where Mom had written Prairie, Nathaniel and Prairie, Katie—and then looked up at two sixteen-year-old high schoolers standing side by side in t-shirts and jeans. Her face turned bright red with second-hand embarrassment.

Dad took one look through the glass doors at the foam parrot, looked at Katie's and my mortified faces, and didn't hesitate for half a second.

"Take those yellow lanyards off, kids," Dad said calmly.

Stepping up to the podium, Dad handed the lanyards back to the relieved counselor, drew a clean line through both of our names on the character breakfast roster, and asked her to cross Katie's name off the afternoon ballet workshop sheet as well.

"Where are the computers and the arcade cabinets on this ship?" Dad asked the counselor.

"Deck 8 Midship, sir—right next to the quiet library and card room," she replied gratefully.

Ten minutes later, sitting side by side in two padded armchairs inside the air-conditioned quiet of the Deck 8 CyberCafé overlooking the deep blue Atlantic, Katie and I finally exhaled. Dad swiped his cabin card to buy two hours of desktop terminal time, pulled the thick, mylar-wrapped Quantum Basic 5.0 library textbook out of his bag, and set it open on the desk right between our keyboards.

While Mom spent the entire Sunday at sea up at the pool bar, the three of us spent the afternoon right there by the ocean windows—Katie pointing out how to nest For…Next loops on the screen, my fingers typing the syntax into the editor, and Dad sitting right beside us smiling with genuine pride.

Part 2: The Nassau Pier, Guest Services, & The Last Straw

Date: 2001-08-22 at 14:00 America/Puerto_Rico

Monday–Wednesday, August 20–22, 2001 — The Nassau Pier & The Honest Question

"Hold onto my arm, Nate—don't look down at the concrete," Katie breathed against my shoulder as the ninety-two-degree Bahamas sun beat straight down onto the endless gray concrete expanse of Prince George Wharf in Nassau on Monday morning.

Ahead of us, Mom was already a hundred yards down the pier, marching briskly toward the duty-free liquor stores and open-air bars along Bay Street without once looking back to see where her children were. Halfway between the ship's gangway and the terminal gate, my right knee buckled without warning. When Katie tried to catch my weight with both hands, her own wrists gave out, and both of us nearly went down onto the hot concrete before Dad caught us under the arms and guided us onto a shaded wooden bench beside the port tram stop.

“Neither of you is walking another step in this heat,” Dad said firmly, kneeling down to check our trembling ankles before flagging down the port courtesy shuttle and hiring an air-conditioned island van driver to take just the three of us over the bridge to the step-free underwater glass aquarium tunnel on Paradise Island.

Over the next forty-eight hours—as the ship steamed south from the Bahamas toward Charlotte Amalie in St. Thomas and Philipsburg in St. Maarten—the gap between what Mom wanted and what our bodies could handle grew wider by the hour. Every time the ship rolled in the Caribbean swell, walking the long metal passageways felt like wading through wet cement, while Mom spent every afternoon running up the cabin bar tab and complaining whenever she passed us that Katie wasn’t attending the ship’s dance classes.

On Wednesday afternoon, Dad collected Katie and me outside the Deck 8 arcade, led us to a quiet, shaded alcove of deck chairs, and looked straight at the two of us.

“Please be honest,” Dad asked quietly. “Are you two not enjoying the cruise?”

When Katie and I looked at each other and struggled to come up with an answer, Dad leaned forward and rested his hands on his knees.

“I want to let you both in on how I feel,” Dad said earnestly. “Katie, this especially goes for you. I watched you teach your brother the Quantum Basic programming that I am learning in school at CCHR, and I am absolutely encouraging both of you to keep at it if you both like it. I see that your mother is trying to talk you into being a ballerina, but I get that you don’t want to.”

“I don’t have the balance to dance,” Katie said honestly, looking down at her sneakers. Mom still refused to accept that we had cerebral palsy—let alone whatever was making our arms and legs grow weaker this summer—insisting she saw two completely healthy kids. “I like this coding thing.”

“And I am encouraging you with this coding thing… I am encouraging both of you,” Dad said warmly.

“I didn’t appreciate that Mom tried booking us on the kid stuff,” I added, thinking back to the foam parrot mascot at Sunday morning’s breakfast door. “Katie and I are sixteen and already in high school, and I don’t want to meet the characters. It’s not even the characters that little kids want to meet, because it’s not Majestic Cruise Line! I want to play the computer games.”

“I get it,” Dad said, nodding firmly. He took a deep breath, his expression turning solemn. “There is something else I wanted to confide in both of you, and that is Mom’s drinking issue. Our next stop will be the front counter where I want to attempt to cut off the flow of alcohol to your mother.”

2:45 PM — Cutting Off the Flow at the Front Counter

The process at the Purser’s Desk in the Deck 5 Atrium Lobby seemed to drag on forever, and Katie and I found a padded seat across the lobby while we waited for Dad to be finished.

Because every bar on the ship operated on cashless plastic stateroom keycards—and because Dad's Anchor Federal Credit Union card was the sole payment method guaranteeing our cabin's Master Folio—Dad had the authority as the primary account holder to revoke all charging privileges on Mom's keycard and have the Watch Purser place a mandatory alcohol cut-off flag on her passenger ID across the ship's point-of-sale network.

When Dad finally walked back over to our bench, he held out three plastic cabin keycards, each newly stamped with a small holographic fountain-cup sticker.

"I bought the three of us a soda package, and we can get sodas and juice every fifteen minutes," Dad told us. "Your mother is going to be mad, but I don't care. I am so sorry to both of you that it is turning out like this, but I have to protect both of you."

Sitting down beside us for a moment, Dad lowered his voice to a quiet whisper.

"I know that you two have decided that you are inseparable, and I am okay with that, and I won't tell the world about your little secret," Dad whispered, looking at Katie and me with steady, unconditional protective warmth. "Yes, I know, and I think I've known for a while. Just don't go blabbing to everyone, and be careful with things."

3:30 PM — The Corridor Breakdown & The Ultimatum

The three of us rode the elevator down to Deck 4 and walked to our stateroom—and to our horror, though not to our surprise, when Dad opened the door, our mother was passed out drunk across the three-cushion convertible sofa that was supposed to unfold into the bed that Katie and I shared at night.

"Oh, I've had enough of your mother's nonsense," Dad said, pulling the door shut and turning Katie and me right around in the passageway.

We walked a long way through a narrow, windowless maze of identical stateroom hallways—our legs trembling and our feet stumbling against the carpet seams with every roll of the ship—until we finally reached a quiet stairwell seating alcove and sat down on the built-in bench.

Right there under the brass wall sconces, Dad buried his face in his hands and absolutely lost it, breaking down and crying.

Katie and I were completely at a loss for words. Our mental image of Daddy being tough and unbreakable came crashing down all at once, and for the first time in our sixteen years, we were seeing the exhausted, hurting human side of our father.

Katie and I sat close against his sides on the bench and just waited, holding hands because this was something neither of us knew how to respond to.

"I guess it will have to be a cruise for three," Katie whispered softly to me.

“Yeah, I guess,” I whispered back to my sister. We both looked over at our father, who was the most upset we had ever seen him in our lives. I didn’t even remember crying this hard when taking a bad fall on the pavement, and yet here the three of us were.

“I’ll try my best to handle this. Daddy needs us right now,” Katie whispered, resting her hand on Dad’s arm. “This is going to be a long and painful cruise.”

That was when we heard a screaming rage echoing down the metal hallway toward our alcove.

“The heck was that?” I asked, my heart jumping as a startled Katie looked up beside me.

“Where is my fucking beer?!”

Our mother had woken up from her drunken nap on our sofa, stormed up to the nearest deck bar, discovered that her keycard had been cut off at the register, and tracked us down the corridor—drunkenly screeching profanities at our visibly upset father.

Spotting Katie and me sitting on the alcove bench directly beneath the black dome of the stairwell’s ceiling security camera, Mom’s bloodshot eyes locked onto us.

“And you two ungrateful brats!” she slurred loudly, staggering forward toward our bench. “I signed you up for the character meet-and-greet and the dance class, and you ditched them and got your father to cut off my card!”

As she lunged toward our bench and swung her arm wildly in my direction, her balance gave out and she missed completely as Dad surged to his feet and stepped squarely between her and the bench, blocking her path in full view of the ceiling security camera.

“Don’t you ever raise a hand toward them!” Dad said, his voice turning to iron as he wiped the last trace of tears from his eyes. “I’ve had enough, and so have the kids. This cruise was supposed to be family time, and the three of us are tired of your drinking. Nathaniel, Katie, and I are giving you a choice right now: us, or the alcohol.”

Mom glared at us and slurred something bitter that none of us could even understand.

“Message received,” Dad said flatly. “You pick the bottle over your husband and children.”

Turning his back on her, Dad looked down at Katie and me and reached out both hands to help us stand up as our mother drunkenly stumbled away down the hall.

“Come on, you two,” Dad said gently. “I want you to show me what you two would like to do.”

As he supported our elbows and led Katie and me away down the passage, Dad made a vow that neither of us would ever forget.

“I’m making both of you a promise: I want to be a dad, and I want you both to help guide me through this,” Dad said quietly. “It will be painful, but your mother does not seem to want to be a mom. I’m sorry, but I have to do right by both of you.”

Holding onto Dad’s arms as our exhausted legs shook beneath us, the three of us stumbled through what felt like an endless hallway of cabins until we finally stumbled out into the bright light of the lobby.

Part 3: Stateroom 6004, The Loaner Wheelchairs, & Pizza for Three on the Aft Deck

Date: 2001-08-23 at 18:30 America/Puerto_Rico

Wednesday, August 22, 2001, 4:15 PM — Domestic Separation, The Brig, & Two Manual Wheelchairs

“My kids can barely stand up after walking down that Deck 4 corridor, and my wife is screaming profanities at us in the passageway,” Dad told the Chief Purser flatly as the three of us reached the front counter in the Atrium Lobby, my knees trembling so badly that I had both hands braced against the marble counter edge while Katie leaned against my side. “I am not putting my son and daughter back in Stateroom 4118 with her tonight. I don’t want her in the cabin with us anymore.”

The Chief Purser glanced down at the black security radio clipped to his lapel, took one look at Dad’s raw, red-rimmed eyes and one look at Katie and me struggling to stay upright on our feet, and immediately picked up a brass master key.

“Deck 4 Security just radioed up after reviewing the stairwell alcove security camera feed, Mr. Prairie,” the Chief Purser said quietly. “Our camera recorded your wife’s outburst in the corridor and her attempt to swing at your son on the bench before you stepped in. We hold two wheelchair-accessible contingency staterooms right off the Deck 6 midship elevators for medical and family safety emergencies. I am placing a confidential Domestic Separation Flag on your manifest right now and moving you, Nathaniel, and Katie into Stateroom 6004. Only your three soda-package keycards will open that door, and our staff is strictly prohibited from disclosing your new cabin number to your wife.”

Dad let out a long breath of pure relief, then glanced down at Katie’s shaking ankles and mine.

“Is there any chance the ship has two manual wheelchairs my twins can use for the rest of the cruise?” Dad asked, looking back at Katie and me to make sure we agreed.

Both Katie and I nodded immediately. Neither of us cared what strangers on a cruise ship thought—we were exhausted from fighting our own legs every time we crossed a deck.

“Consider it done, sir,” the Chief Purser replied. “I’ll have the Medical Center bring two folding SwiftChair manual wheelchairs straight up to Stateroom 6004 while our stewards transfer your bags and your library books from Deck 4.”

By five o'clock that afternoon, Dad, Katie, and I were safely upstairs inside Stateroom 6004—a wide, quiet room five steps from the elevator lobby with a clean double sofa bed that unfolded without a single obstacle and two folding manual wheelchairs waiting by the door.

At seven-fifteen that evening, while Katie and I were sitting together on the sofa bed reading Dad's Quantum Basic 5.0 library book, a polite knock sounded on our cabin door. When Dad opened it, the Chief Purser stood in the corridor with a clipboard under his arm.

"I wanted to check on you and the twins in person, Mr. Prairie, and let you know that you won't have to worry about running into your wife on the decks for the rest of the voyage," the Chief Purser told Dad evenly, his voice carrying clearly to where Katie and I sat. "About an hour ago, Mrs. Prairie returned to Stateroom 4118, found your luggage gone, and came down to the Atrium Lobby after her keycard was declined at the Lido Bar. When we refused to disclose your new cabin number or unblock her alcohol privileges, she tried to climb over the Purser's counter and swung a fist at one of our Security officers. The Staff Captain has placed her in the ship's brig down on Deck 2."

Katie's hand tightened around mine on the sofa cushion as we listened.

"Because we have already cleared our final Caribbean port of call and are steaming north," the Chief Purser continued, handing Dad a thick, sealed manila envelope, "she will remain in security custody until we dock at Port Canaveral on Saturday morning, where she will be escorted off the vessel and handed a permanent lifetime ban from Sunward Cruise Lines. Inside this envelope is a certified copy of our Shipboard Security Incident Report along with a duplicate VHS tape from the Deck 4 stairwell security camera documenting the 3:30 PM corridor incident, in case your family attorney in Virginia needs official documentation. I also want to assure you, Nathaniel, and Katie that your names are completely clear—none of the three of you are excluded from sailing with us in the future."

Dad thanked him quietly and closed the door. Mom had managed to get herself banned from a cruise line yet again—not that Dad, Katie, or I ever wanted to set foot on a cruise ship again in the first place.

Thursday, August 23, 2001, 6:30 PM — Pizza & Soda Refills on the Aft Deck

"Two pepperoni slices, two extra-cheese slices, and three fifteen-minute fountain refills—two colas and an orange juice," Dad announced with a genuine smile on Thursday evening as he set a steaming stainless-steel pizza platter and three tall plastic tumblers down on our round table out on the open wooden aft deck.

Sitting side by side in our two ship-provided folding manual wheelchairs right at the back rail of Deck 9, watching the white foaming wake of the ship stretch out across the turquoise Caribbean Sea under a golden-orange sunset, Katie and I reached across the space between our wheelchair armrests and laced our fingers together.

Inside the main dining rooms tonight was Captain's Formal Night, where hundreds of passengers were crammed into noisy banquet halls in stiff suits and high heels. Out here on the breezy fantail deck, wearing comfortable t-shirts and jeans with zero pain in our calves or knees thanks to the manual wheelchairs, the last two days of the voyage had finally become what Katie had whispered in the corridor alcove: a peaceful cruise for three.

“How do the chairs feel?” Dad asked softly, pulling his deck chair right up beside our wheels and picking up a slice of pizza.

“So much better, Dad,” Katie said, leaning her head briefly against my shoulder as she took a sip from her straw. “My legs aren’t shaking at all.”

“Mine either,” I agreed, looking down at our three soda-sticker keycards resting together on the table next to Dad’s library copy of Quantum Basic 5.0. For the first time all week, nobody was yelling, nobody was trying to force Katie to dance or shove us into a room with foam parrot mascots, and as the warm ocean breeze blew past the stern rail, the three of us talked for two straight hours about the programs we were going to write when we got home to Virginia Beach.

Part 4: Back on Dry Land & The Twelve-Hour Drive Up I-95

Date: 2001-08-25 at 08:30 America/New_York

Saturday, August 25, 2001, 8:30 AM — Back on Dry Land

“Nathaniel. Katie. I’m sorry that your first cruise was wrecked, and somehow I want to make it up to both of you,” Dad said earnestly as two crew members helped us transfer out of the ship’s loaner wheelchairs onto the gray cloth back bench seat of our Holt sedan at the Port Canaveral pickup curb. Resting a steady hand on each of our shoulders through the open door, Dad continued, “Here is what we will do: neither one of you wanted to go on that cruise, but your mother insisted. I want to finish school at CCHR so that I can do a better job at being a dad without having to worry about money as much.”

Before Katie or I could answer him, an angry screech tore across the concrete baggage drop from behind us.

“You! You told the ship to stop my drinks!”

Looking through the open rear doorway, I saw our mother being escorted out of the customs terminal doors by two Sunward Cruise Lines security officers after being released from the ship’s brig, clutching a folded white sheet of permanent lifetime ban paperwork in her fist. Her face was flushed dark red in the morning Florida heat as she stormed up to the rear fender of our car.

Every muscle in Dad’s jaw tightened as he straightened up beside our open door and looked at her.

“If we were anywhere near Hampton Roads right now, Brenda, I would hand you twenty dollars for a bus fare and leave you standing on this curb,” Dad told her, his voice as cold and flat as steel. “The only reason I am unlocking this front door is because we are seven hundred miles from Virginia. Get in the front passenger seat, and don’t say a single word to the kids for the next twelve hours. The second this car pulls into our driveway in Virginia Beach, you are packing your bags and getting out of our house.”

Without waiting for her to reply, Dad closed our rear door securely, walked around to the driver's side, and pulled out of Port Canaveral toward Interstate 95 North.

12:15 PM — Exit 94 Near Savannah, Georgia: The Gas Pump, The Restrooms, & Brenda's First Angle

For the first three and a half hours heading north out of Florida across the Georgia state line, the inside of the car was dead silent except for the hum of the tires and the air conditioner. In the back seat, Katie and I sat pressed shoulder-to-shoulder with our inner hands laced together and Dad's mylar-wrapped Quantum Basic 5.0 library textbook resting across our knees.

Just past noon, the low-fuel chime dinged on the dashboard, and Dad signaled right at Exit 94 near Savannah, pulling under the canopy of a highway travel plaza so we could get gas and use the restrooms.

That stop was when the physical reality of leaving the ship hit Katie and me all over again.

On Thursday and Friday aboard the Sunward Tropics, we had rolled everywhere in the Medical Center's two folding loaner wheelchairs. Those wheelchairs belonged to the ship, which meant they were still back at Port Canaveral. When Dad opened our rear door beside Pump 6 and I swung my sneakers out onto the ninety-degree Georgia concrete, my knees and calves trembled so violently that I had to grab the roof frame with both hands just to keep from sliding onto the pavement. Beside me, when Katie tried to push herself up off the bench cushion, the strength in her right forearm gave out halfway up, and she gasped softly as she sank back against the seat.

Up front, Mom didn't even glance back at our door. She slammed the front passenger door shut and marched briskly across the concrete apron toward the air-conditioned travel store restrooms on her own.

Dad saw us struggling immediately. Leaving the gas nozzle clicking in the tank, he stepped right between Katie and me, braced his left arm firmly around Katie's waist and his right hand under my elbow, and took half of our weight onto his own shoulders.

"Take your time, kids—I've got both of you," Dad murmured close to our ears as he walked us slowly, step by shuffling step, across the hot pavement and up the curb ramp to the restroom hallway. He stood waiting right between the men's and women's doors until both of us came back out, then supported us all the way back to the back seat of the Holt before topping off the tank and paying at the window.

When Mom finally strolled back out of the convenience store carrying a bottle of water and buckled herself into the front passenger seat, her furious scowl from Port Canaveral was suddenly replaced by self-pity. As Dad checked in the rearview mirror to make sure Katie and I were buckled securely into our back-seat shoulder belts, shifted into drive, and merged back onto I-95 North, Mom launched into a bitter, non-stop tirade about how "unfairly" she had been treated down in the ship's brig.

“David, honey, look—let’s be reasonable now that we’re off that awful boat,” Mom complained, turning slightly toward him in the front seat. “Do you have any idea how terrible life in a cruise ship brig actually is, or what I just went through for sixty-two straight hours? It was completely unfair! That purser had it out for me from the moment we boarded, and those security guards treated me like a common criminal over a couple of drinks!”

In the back seat, Katie and I glanced at each other and squeezed hands as Mom kept going, oblivious to the way Dad’s jaw was clenching harder with every word out of her mouth.

“They put wrist restraints on me and marched me down a steel freight elevator to the Deck 2 crew corridor below the waterline, right on top of the diesel engine room!” Mom ranted, her voice rising with indignation. “They confiscated my cabin card, my wristwatch, my belt, and even my shoes! For two and a half days I was locked inside a windowless steel box that vibrated twenty-four hours a day from the ship’s engines. No porthole, no clock, no television, no pillow—just a hard vinyl mat bolted to the steel floor with a stiff hook-and-loop tear-away blanket, an institutional stainless-steel toilet welded to the sink in the corner, and a blinding fluorescent ceiling light with a security camera staring at me that never turned off once!”

Beside me, Katie leaned her head close to my shoulder. Both of us could see the muscles in Dad’s neck and shoulders stiffening against the driver’s backrest. Mom thought she was winning sympathy, when in reality every single complaint she made was hardening Dad’s resolve like poured concrete.

“And the food!” Mom went on, gesturing with her water bottle. “While the three of you were upstairs doing whatever you wanted, they wouldn’t even let me have a soda! Every four hours the ship’s doctor or some nurse slid open the metal slot in the door to take my blood pressure and hand me paper cones of lukewarm tap water and salt packets while my head was splitting open! Three times a day a guard shoved a paper plate of bland crew-galley mush through the slot with a bendable plastic spoon, and every fifteen minutes day and night a guard slid the peephole open to write on a clipboard! Then yesterday afternoon they had the nerve to tell me that stewards had packed my clothes out of Cabin 4118 with red security tape and handed me a lifetime ban! I’ve been punished enough, David—there’s no reason to talk crazy about me packing bags when we get home.”

Katie looked at me and gave a tiny, unmistakable shake of her head. Every argument she makes, Katie’s eyes said to mine, just weakens her case even more.

I thought the exact same thing. For sixty-two hours down on Deck 2, Mom hadn’t spent a single minute worrying about her sixteen-year-old twins or her husband—she had only cared about her confiscated watch, her crew-galley trays, and her cut-off beer tab.

From the back bench seat, I watched Dad’s knuckles turn white against the top of the steering wheel. In the rearview mirror, his eyes met mine and Katie’s for a brief, steady second before he answered without even looking at Mom.

“You swung a fist at a ship security officer because they wouldn’t serve you beer at four o’clock in the afternoon, Brenda,” Dad said in a low, gravelly voice that carried clearly to the back seat. “That headache you had down on Deck 2 was sixty-two hours of forced sobriety. And while you were passed out drunk on the kids’ sofa bed before security locked you up, I had to hold our sixteen-year-old son and daughter up by their elbows because their legs and arms were giving out on them. Just ten minutes ago at that gas pump, neither one of them could stand up out of the back seat without leaning on me, and you walked right past them to the store without looking back once. That brig wasn't unfair. It was the consequence of who you've chosen to be."

4:45 PM — Rocky Mount, North Carolina: Drive-Thru Dinner & Cementing the Lawyer Decision

By quarter to five that afternoon, as the green highway signs ticked past Fayetteville and into Rocky Mount, North Carolina, the three of us were starving and needed another restroom stop.

After Dad helped Katie and me carefully in and out of the roadside rest-area bathrooms just off the exit—where my wrists shook so badly I could barely push the heavy metal restroom door open by myself—Dad didn't make us walk inside a crowded highway sit-down restaurant and try to carry plastic food trays on trembling arms. Instead, he pulled the Holt sedan straight into the drive-thru lane of a Penny's hamburger restaurant next to the interstate ramp, ordered four cheeseburger meals, and handed a warm white paper bag of cheeseburgers and fries back to Katie and me before merging back onto the highway.

Buckled safely into our three-point shoulder seatbelts side by side on the gray cloth rear bench seat as the pine trees and green I-95 NORTH signs rolled past our rear window, Katie held the white paper Penny's bag on her lap while Dad's mylar-wrapped Quantum Basic 5.0 library textbook rested open across mine, with our inner hands clasped tightly together on the cushion between us.

Up in the front passenger seat, as Mom finished her sandwich, I heard her abandon the brig complaints and try a second angle—cold financial bargaining.

"Think about this logically for two seconds, David," Mom said, her voice sharp and calculating in the quiet car. "You're taking classes at CCHR. How exactly do you think you're going to pay the house note in Virginia Beach, buy groceries, finish your degree, and take care of two sixteen-year-olds all by yourself without my income? Look—I'll cut back to drinking only on Friday and Saturday nights. We can put this behind us and go back to normal on Monday."

Beside me in the back seat, Katie squeezed my left hand with her right. Neither of us was even afraid that Dad would give in anymore—watching the back of Dad's shoulders, both of us could tell that Mom was digging her own grave deeper with every sentence.

"She doesn't get it at all," Katie whispered so softly that only I could hear her over the hum of the highway tires.

"Not even a little," I whispered back, looking down at our joined hands between my open Quantum Basic book and her lunch bag. Since the day we were born, Katie and I had been each other's anchor, best friend, and safe harbor—and in the lifelong bond the two of us shared, there was simply no room left for someone as bitter, selfish, and mean as our mother. All we needed was each other and our dad.

Up front, I watched Dad slowly set his cup into the center console holder, glance briefly toward the passenger seat, and speak in a calm, ironclad voice I had never heard from him in my life.

“Thank you for saying that out loud, Brenda—because if I had one percent of doubt left about seeking a lawyer’s advice when we get home, every argument you’ve made since Florida just erased it,” Dad told her evenly. “You spent three hours complaining about a steel bunk in the brig, and now you’re bargaining to drink on weekends—and you still haven’t asked Nathaniel or Katie a single time in eight hours why their legs and arms are failing them. I don’t care if I have to work double shifts around my CCHR classes to pay the bills. First thing Monday morning at eight-thirty, I am calling a divorce lawyer to file for divorce and full custody of the twins, and my very next call is going to be to Dr. Carter’s office to get both of them examined. We are never going back to ‘normal.’”

Mom opened her mouth, saw the look on Dad’s face, and snapped her jaw shut without another word for the rest of North Carolina and Virginia.

9:15 PM — Home in Virginia Beach: Packing the Bags

At nine-fifteen that night, after more than twelve hours on the road, the headlights of our Holt sedan finally swept across our driveway in Virginia Beach.

Before touching a single suitcase in the trunk, Dad walked around to our rear door, helped Katie and me out of the back seat, and supported both of us up the front steps and straight inside to the living room sofa, propping two throw pillows behind our backs and setting his Quantum Basic 5.0 library book on the coffee table within easy reach.

Then, true to his word from Port Canaveral, Dad walked back out into the front foyer, folded his arms across his chest, and stood watch at the bottom of the stairs for forty-five straight minutes while Brenda packed her suitcases, dragged them out the front door to her car, and backed out of the driveway.

When Dad clicked the front deadbolt shut and walked into the living room to check on us, our house was finally, mercifully peaceful.

Part 5: Monday Morning in Virginia Beach — The Divorce Lawyer, The PCP, & Borrowed Time

Date: 2001-08-27 at 10:15 America/New_York

Monday, August 27, 2001, 10:15 AM — The Divorce Lawyer, The PCP, & Borrowed Time

“Squeeze my fingers as hard as you can, Nathaniel, and hold it for five seconds,” Dr. Evelyn Carter instructed gently inside Exam Room 2 of her Virginia Beach family practice clinic on Monday morning.

Sitting side by side on the crinkly white paper of the padded exam table in our t-shirts and jeans, Katie and I kept our inner hands laced tightly together between our knees while I reached my left hand out to squeeze Dr. Carter's fingers.

Earlier that morning at eight-thirty, while Katie and I sat at the kitchen table eating cereal with the sealed Sunward Cruise Lines manila envelope resting beside the napkin holder, we had listened as Dad stood by the kitchen wall phone and kept the first half of his highway vow—calling a family law and divorce attorney's office off Independence Boulevard.

When Dad told the attorney on the line that he had a certified Shipboard Security Incident Report and a duplicate VHS security camera tape from Deck 4 showing Brenda's corridor outburst and her attempt to swing at me on the bench over the character meet-and-greet, we watched a wave of relief wash across Dad's face. Hanging up the receiver, Dad had turned to Katie and me and explained what the lawyer had just told him: under Virginia law, the one-year separation waiting period only applied to no-fault divorces. Because the ship's security camera had caught her attempt to strike a minor child and her subsequent detention in the brig, Dad qualified to file immediately on fault grounds of cruelty and reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt—allowing the lawyer to petition the Virginia Beach court right away for sole custody of the two of us, exclusive possession of our house, and a protective order without waiting a single year.

The moment he finished writing down our afternoon appointment time with the lawyer, Dad dialed Dr. Carter, our Primary Care Physician, and explained how badly our arms and legs had been giving out on the cruise and at the Interstate 95 rest stops. Dr. Carter's nurse had told him to bring both of us straight in at ten o'clock.

For the first two seconds, my grip held around Dr. Carter's fingers—and then, no matter how hard I concentrated, the strength in my forearm and wrist drained away like water through a sieve. When Dr. Carter tested Katie's grip, her shoulder resistance, and the dorsiflexion in both of our ankles, the exact same drop-off happened.

Dr. Carter stepped back, slipped her reflex hammer into the pocket of her white coat, and looked gravely at Dad, who was standing protectively right beside us.

"David," Dr. Carter said quietly, "bringing them in immediately after you got back from Florida was the exact right call."

"They've had mild cerebral palsy since they were little," Dad said, his hand resting warmly on Katie's shoulder. "Brenda always ignored it and acted like they were two completely typical kids, so at first I assumed the ship's movement was just aggravating their balance. Why are both their arms and their legs getting worse at sixteen?"

"Because cerebral palsy does not degenerate over time," Dr. Carter answered clearly, looking from Dad to Katie and me with deep compassion. "Cerebral palsy is a static, non-progressive condition. When sixteen-year-old twins begin losing measurable motor strength in both their lower extremities and their upper extremities over the course of a single summer, something else is happening."

Beside me on the exam table, Katie squeezed my fingers with every ounce of strength left in her hand, and I squeezed right back.

“I’m ordering a full neuromuscular blood panel, nerve conduction studies, and a genetic workup this morning,” Dr. Carter continued gently, picking up her chart clipboard. “Until those test results come back and tell us exactly what condition we are dealing with, I need all three of you to prepare yourselves for the reality of what I’m seeing in their muscle tone today. When it comes to walking, Nathaniel and Katie are on borrowed time. Eventually, neither of them is going to be able to walk, and because their upper arms and wrists are fatiguing too, they are eventually going to need power wheelchairs.”

The quiet exam room seemed to hold its breath around those words—on borrowed time.

“How soon will the test results be back, Evelyn?” Dad asked quietly, his hand resting steady and warm on Katie’s shoulder.

“The genetic and nerve-conduction panel takes about two and a half weeks,” Dr. Carter answered, writing an appointment card at her desk and handing it to Dad. “Let’s schedule their next checkup for Friday afternoon, September fourteenth, at three o’clock—right after their two o’clock dismissal at Northwood High School. You can pick them up when the final bell rings at two, bring them straight here for their three o’clock appointment, and we’ll check how their arms and legs are holding up and go over every test result together.”

Yet as I looked sideways at my twin sister, and felt Dad’s steady, unwavering arm wrap around both of our shoulders at once, the fear didn’t break us. Whatever the test results showed when we came back for our three o’clock checkup after school on September fourteenth, Mom’s screaming was gone, Daddy was standing right beside us, and Katie and I were going to face every single mile of it together.

Junior Year at Northwood High & The Prognosis

Part 1: The Fault-Grounds Filing, The Protective Order, & Junior Year at Northwood High School

Date: 2001-09-04 at 11:40 America/New_York

Monday, August 27, 2001, 2:00 PM — The Lawyer’s Office off Independence Boulevard

“Timestamp fifteen-thirty-two and eighteen seconds,” family law attorney Arthur Vance read aloud in his quiet, wood-paneled conference room off Independence Boulevard, pressing the pause button on his office VCR remote so the grainy black-and-white frame from the M/S Sunward Tropics Deck 4 stairwell camera froze on the television screen.

Sitting side by side on the leather sofa across from Mr. Vance’s desk with our inner hands clasped tightly together, Katie and I looked at the frozen image on the screen. Right there beneath the ceiling camera’s timestamp—AUG 22 2001 15:32:18 CAM-04B—was our mother lunging toward our alcove bench with her arm raised, and Dad standing like a shield squarely between her and the two of us.

“Mr. Prairie, in twenty-four years of practicing family law in Virginia Beach, I have rarely seen a cleaner, more airtight evidentiary packet,” Mr. Vance said, setting the remote down beside the Staff Captain’s notarized Shipboard Security Incident Report and permanent lifetime exclusion notice. “Normally in Virginia, when minor children are involved, a couple has to live separate and apart for one full year before filing for a no-fault divorce. You do not have to wait a single day.”

Across from us, Dad leaned forward in his chair, his hands folded on the edge of the mahogany table.

“How fast can we get the court orders in place so Brenda can’t come back to the house or show up at their high school when classes start next week?” Dad asked.

“This afternoon,” Mr. Vance answered firmly. “Because the ship’s security camera captured her attempting to strike sixteen-year-old Nathaniel while intoxicated—and because the ship’s brig and medical logs corroborate every word—we are filing a fault-based Complaint for Divorce on grounds of cruelty and reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt under Virginia Code Section 20-91(A)(6) before the Circuit Court clerk’s office closes at four o’clock. Alongside it, I am walking an emergency pendente lite petition and family protective order straight in to the duty judge.”

Mr. Vance counted the points off on his fingers so Katie and I could follow every step.

“First, you get immediate temporary sole legal and physical custody of Nathaniel and Katie,” Mr. Vance said. “Second, you get exclusive use and possession of the marital home in Virginia Beach—meaning you are legally authorized to change every lock on the doors tonight, and Brenda cannot set foot on the property. Third, the protective order bars her from coming within five hundred feet of the twins or setting foot on the campus of Northwood High School. And fourth, because fault grounds of cruelty bar an offending spouse from receiving alimony under Virginia law, she won’t get a dime of spousal support.”

Beside me on the leather sofa, Katie tightened her fingers around my hand and looked across the mahogany desk at the attorney.

“Mr. Vance,” Katie said quietly, her voice trembling for just a heartbeat before steadying with the quiet resolve we had both shared in the back seat of Dad’s car on the drive over, “after what she did to us on that ship—dragging us onto a cruise we never wanted to go on, screaming at us in the passageway, and trying to force two sixteen-year-olds to go to a costumed children’s character meet-and-greet like toddlers—Nathaniel and I talked about it together. Neither of us wants her carrying the last name Prairie anymore. Is there a way in the divorce decree to make her go back to her maiden name?”

Dad turned in his chair and looked at Katie and me with deep, protective respect before facing the lawyer.

“You heard them, Arthur,” Dad said firmly. “After what she put my son and daughter through, they don’t want her carrying our family name—and I want their wishes respected in the final decree.”

Mr. Vance nodded thoughtfully, tapping his gold pen against his legal pad as a shrewd veteran litigator's smile crossed his face.

"Under Code of Virginia Section 20-121.4, the court restores a party's maiden name as part of the final divorce decree upon her signed request or stipulation," Mr. Vance explained, looking directly at Katie and me so we knew he was taking our request seriously. "A judge can't force a name change in a vacuum—but under Section 20-109.1, we can make reverting to her maiden name a binding condition of the financial property settlement. Remember, she secretly ran up more than six thousand dollars on the marital credit card to book that cruise behind your father's back, and under equitable distribution, I can petition the court to saddle her with half of that cruise debt plus your attorney's fees. When her lawyer calls me to beg for a walk-away release from the cruise debt and a small relocation check so she can get an apartment of her own, I will tell them your father's non-negotiable condition: she only gets the debt release and the settlement check if she signs the Section 20-121.4 stipulation in the divorce decree restoring her maiden name, Walsh, and surrendering the name Prairie on her driver's license and Social Security card. Knowing her pride—and her wallet—she'll sign it before the ink is dry."

Beside me on the leather sofa, Katie let out a long, quiet breath and leaned her shoulder against mine. That evening before dinner, Dad bought three brass deadbolt kits at the hardware store, changed every lock on our front, back, and garage doors, and handed the shiny new keys to Katie and me.

Tuesday, September 4, 2001, 11:40 AM — Junior Year at Northwood High School

"We actually pulled it off, Nate—fourth-block lunch and study hall together every single day," Katie said with a relieved smile the Tuesday after Labor Day as the two of us eased down side by side onto the bench of a quiet, sunlit corner table near the tall windows of the Northwood High School cafeteria.

Back in July, when we had given up half of our mornings to sit through high-school summer school and knock out a required academic credit early, this exact forty-five-minute sanctuary in the middle of our Junior year schedule was what we had worked for. Earlier that morning at seven-forty-five, Dad had walked into the Northwood High main office with us to hand-deliver a certified copy of the Virginia Beach judge's custody and protective orders to the principal's secretary, removing Brenda's name from our emergency contact cards for good.

Yet as grateful as Katie and I were to be sitting together with our brown paper lunch bags, juice boxes, and our spiral Quantum Basic notebook open on the tabletop between us, getting through the first three class periods of eleventh grade had been a sobering wake-up call for our bodies.

Even without the roll of a cruise ship beneath our feet, the long linoleum hallways and concrete stairwells of Northwood High School had pushed our legs and arms to the brink before noon. Halfway up the B-Wing stairs to second-period Chemistry, my left calf had cramped and given out so suddenly that I would have gone down on the steps if Katie hadn't grabbed my belt loop—and when she tried to pull my weight upright against the handrail, her own right wrist and forearm had trembled so violently that she dropped her binder across the landing. By the time we reached the cafeteria doors at eleven-forty, my thighs felt like lead weights and Katie's fingers were shaking so hard that I had to help her pinch open the top of her straw wrapper.

Reaching across the table between our lunch bags, I laced my right fingers through Katie's left hand and rested our joined hands flat on the cool laminate tabletop so neither of our wrists had to work to hold them up.

"How bad are your legs shaking right now?" I asked her quietly beneath the chatter of the cafeteria.

"From my knees down to my ankles," Katie admitted softly, her thumb brushing against the back of my hand as she glanced down at the event-loop diagram in my notebook. "And my right shoulder still hurts from carrying my backpack down the upstairs hall. Our next scheduled checkup with Dr. Carter is next Friday afternoon after school, right?"

"Friday at three o'clock," I nodded, squeezing her hand gently. "Dad's picking us up right at the two o'clock dismissal bell so Dr. Carter can see how our arms and legs are doing. Whatever happens, we've got Dad on our side now, and we've got this lunch table every day. We'll get through eleventh grade together."

Part 2: When Borrowed Time Runs Out — The Collapse at School, The Emergency Room Escalation, & Time for Powerchairs

Date: 2001-09-14 at 13:15 America/New_York

Friday, September 14, 2001, 1:15 PM — When Our Legs Finally Gave Out at School

"Just forty-five more minutes until the two o'clock dismissal bell, Katie, and Dad'll be waiting for us right out front in the pickup loop," I whispered at a quarter past one on Friday afternoon as the two of us walked slowly down the quiet first-floor B-Wing hallway of Northwood High School on our way back from the guidance office.

All week long, all I knew was that Friday afternoon at three o'clock was our next scheduled checkup with Dr. Evelyn Carter. Dad had arranged his Friday schedule at the Community College of Hampton Roads so he could pick Katie and me up right when school let out at two o'clock and drive us straight over to Dr. Carter's office for our three o'clock appointment to see how our arms and legs were doing and go over whatever test results had come back from the lab.

All we had to do was make it thirty more feet down the waxed linoleum corridor to our sixth-block classroom door.

We were holding hands between us for balance, walking close to the lockers so we could brush our free fingertips against the metal doors if our ankles wobbled, when the sensation below my knees suddenly vanished.

It wasn't a slow cramp like on the stairwell the week before, and it wasn't just our calves getting tired. Halfway past Room 112, it felt as though someone had reached inside our spines and pulled the electrical plug on both of our lower bodies at the exact same second.

My right knee buckled inward without an ounce of resistance. Beside me, Katie let out a sharp gasp as both of her ankles folded underneath her at the exact same instant, and before either one of us could catch the locker handles, the two of us collapsed straight down onto the hard linoleum floor.

"Nathaniel! Katie!" Mr. Rutledge, our eleventh-grade U.S. History teacher, called out in alarm from his open classroom doorway ten feet ahead of us, dropping his dry-erase marker onto his podium and hurrying out into the hallway. "Are you two all right?!"

My heart was hammering against my ribs from the shock of going down so fast, and my instinct—the stubborn sixteen-year-old instinct that had kept both of us forcing our legs down hallways all week—was to get right back up before the rest of the class saw us on the floor.

"We're okay, Mr. Rutledge—just let us stand back up," I gasped, planting my left palm flat on the cold floor while Katie braced her hands against the tiles beside me.

Straining with every muscle left in our shoulders, wrists, and thighs, Katie and I tried to push ourselves back up onto our feet.

We didn't even make it halfway to our knees.

The moment we put weight on our legs and trembling forearms, both of our legs and arms crumpled completely out from under us a second time—sending both of us pitching forward and sideways with nothing left to break our fall.

Crack. Thud.

The right side of my forehead slammed hard against the unforgiving linoleum-over-concrete floor, sending a bright, stinging flash across my vision, and six inches away I heard the sickening thud of the left side of Katie's head striking the tiles right beside the locker base.

Before the ringing in my ears even settled, my very first instinct—and Katie's—was the exact same one we had had since the day we were born. Lying flat on the cold linoleum floor with a hot, throbbing knot rising on my forehead, I reached my right hand blindly across the six inches of tile between us, and Katie's left hand met mine in midair, our fingers locking together in a vise grip so neither of us was alone on that floor.

"Stay down! Do not try to get up again!" Mr. Rutledge shouted, his voice dropping an octave in urgent alarm as he saw both of our heads strike the floor and our hands clasp together between us.

He sprinted three steps to the classroom wall intercom just inside his doorway and pressed the red emergency call button. "Main Office, get Nurse Callahan to the first-floor B-Wing hallway outside Room 112 immediately! I need a Clinic Emergency escalation right now—Nathaniel and Katie Prairie both collapsed in the hallway, their legs gave out a second time when they tried to get up, and both of them hit their heads on the floor!”

Friday, September 14, 2001, 1:18 PM — Manual C-Spine Stabilization & The Emergency Room Escalation

Within forty-five seconds, Nurse Callahan, the school’s registered nurse, arrived at a dead run with her orange trauma bag, followed closely by Assistant Principal Brooks and the clinic aide.

One look at the two of us lying flat on the hard tile floor holding hands with red, swelling contusions rising on our foreheads—and Mr. Rutledge’s report that our arms had given out on the second collapse so nothing had cushioned our heads—was all Nurse Callahan needed to escalate the protocol straight to the Emergency Room.

“Nobody lift them and nobody let them sit up!” Nurse Callahan ordered immediately, dropping to her knees behind my head while her trained clinic aide knelt behind Katie’s head. Gently but firmly, Nurse Callahan placed both of her palms along the sides of my head to hold my neck in manual inline cervical stabilization, while her aide stabilized Katie’s head the exact same way so neither of us could turn or nod our necks.

“Mr. Brooks,” Nurse Callahan commanded, “we have an unbroken dual head strike against concrete-backed tile plus acute bilateral lower-extremity paralysis. Under school division head-and-spine protocol, they cannot be lifted into clinic wheelchairs and they cannot go home in a passenger car until an Emergency Room CT scan clears their heads and cervical spines. Call 911 right now for Virginia Beach EMS transport to Bayside General Hospital Emergency Room, put B-Wing on a temporary Hold in Place so the hallway stays clear when the bell rings, and call their father to meet the ambulance at the ER!”

“Calling 911 and Mr. Prairie right now,” Assistant Principal Brooks said, unclipping his radio and telephone handset as Mr. Rutledge closed the classroom doors along the corridor.

Down on the floor, even with Nurse Callahan’s hands cradling the sides of my head so I couldn’t turn my neck, I kept my right hand laced tightly through Katie’s left hand on the tiles between us.

“Nathaniel, Katie—keep looking straight up at the ceiling tiles so your necks stay completely still, and keep holding each other’s hands,” Nurse Callahan said calmly as she checked my pupils and then Katie’s with her penlight. “Can both of you hear me and tell me your full names?”

“Nathaniel Prairie,” I answered clearly, squeezing Katie’s fingers twice so she knew I was okay.

“Katie Prairie,” Katie answered right after me, squeezing my hand back just as tightly.

“Did either of you black out when your heads hit the floor? Do you know where you are, what day it is, and what happened right before you fell?” Nurse Callahan asked.

“No, ma’am, neither of us blacked out,” I said, my voice steady despite the throbbing ache over my right eyebrow. “It’s Friday, September fourteenth, and we’re in the B-Wing hallway at Northwood High School. Our dad was supposed to pick us up at the two o’clock dismissal bell to take us to our three o’clock appointment with Dr. Evelyn Carter to see how our arms and legs were doing—and while we were walking down the hall, our legs just gave out all at once.”

“And when we tried to push ourselves back up,” Katie added clearly from beside me, “our legs and arms crumpled again and we hit our heads.”

“Can either of you wiggle your toes or push your feet forward against Mr. Rutledge’s palms?” Nurse Callahan asked.

I concentrated with everything I had, ordering my ankles and calves to move. Nothing happened. Neither of my feet moved a fraction of an inch, and neither did Katie’s.

“All right, don’t strain,” Nurse Callahan told us gently as the distant wail of sirens approached down the boulevard outside. “Your dad is already on his way to the Bayside General Emergency Room to meet you, and I had the front office call Dr. Evelyn Carter’s clinic too—she has hospital privileges at Bayside General and she’s bringing your test results straight over to the Emergency Room to meet your dad there.”

Four minutes later, four Virginia Beach EMS paramedics wheeled two ambulance stretchers through the B-Wing double doors, where Nurse Callahan handed the lead paramedic two printed clinic sheets from her clipboard.

“Both patients are sixteen-year-old fraternal twins on the autism spectrum, Glasgow Coma Scale fifteen, with an unbroken dual head strike and acute bilateral lower-extremity motor loss,” Nurse Callahan briefed the lead paramedic right beside us so I could hear every word. “Look at their hands right now—they ground themselves and prevent sensory panic by holding hands and hugging. Obviously they can’t sit up or hug while they’re in C-collars on backboards, but please keep their stretchers close enough together in the rig and at triage that they don’t have to let go of each other’s hands, and brief the ER Charge Nurse before you roll in.”

“Copy that, Nurse—we’ll keep them side by side in Squad 14 and call it in to Bayside General Triage on the radio,” the lead paramedic nodded.

Working with practiced precision so our spines never bent or twisted, the paramedics fitted soft foam cervical collars around our necks, unclipped two-piece aluminum scoop stretchers that slid underneath our backs and hips from both sides on the floor, and lifted Katie and me smoothly onto the two padded gurneys—locking the two stretchers side by side in the back of the dual-patient squad rig so my right hand and Katie’s left hand stayed clasped between the rails the entire ride to the hospital.

Friday, September 14, 2001, 2:10 PM — Hospital Rules, The CT Doorway, & Dr. Carter's Verdict in the ER

Because the Community College of Hampton Roads campus was only ten minutes from Bayside General Hospital, Dad actually beat our ambulance to the Emergency Room entrance by two minutes.

When the rear doors of Squad 14 swung open at the ER bay, Dad was already standing right beside the ER Charge Nurse, having briefed her himself that we were sixteen-year-old twins on the autism spectrum who grounded ourselves through physical contact—and that Dr. Evelyn Carter had already called down from her clinic across the medical plaza to let the ER team know she was bringing our neuromuscular lab packet over in person.

Even with Nurse Callahan's handoff and Dad's briefing, however, there were still real hospital rules for sixteen-year-old minors that the Emergency Room couldn't bend.

First, because Katie and I were opposite-sex sixteen-year-old minors, hospital policy required the triage team to wheel us into two separate adjacent trauma bays—Bay 3 and Bay 4—divided by a heavy fabric privacy curtain while the ER nurses checked our spines and stuck cardiac monitor leads under our shirts. While we lay flat in our rigid foam cervical collars unable to sit up or hug, the Charge Nurse compromised by leaving a six-inch gap at the bottom of the curtain between our two bays so I could reach my right hand under the curtain hem and hold onto Katie's left hand while the monitors beeped overhead.

Second—and hardest of all—was the hospital's radiation safety rule at the CT scanner.

"Mr. Prairie, I know they ground themselves by holding hands, but federal radiation rules only allow one patient inside the CT scanner room at a time," the radiology tech explained gently when the orderlies arrived at two-twenty to wheel us down the hall for our head and cervical spine scans. "We'll scan Katie first while Nathaniel's gurney waits right outside the lead glass door with you, and then we'll swap them. They'll only be apart for five minutes each."

Letting go of Katie's fingers outside the heavy lead-lined doors of the CT suite while my own neck was strapped flat in a foam collar was the longest five minutes of my life. As the sliding door closed behind Katie's gurney, my heart rate monitor began to beep faster—until Dad stepped right up beside my stretcher, took my right hand in both of his warm palms, and stood where he could see through the control-room glass.

"I'm looking right at her through the window, Nate—she's lying totally still inside the scanner ring and giving us a thumbs-up with her left hand," Dad narrated calmly, squeezing my fingers until my breathing steadied. "Ninety more seconds and she's coming right back out, and then I'll watch you through the glass while Katie waits right here."

True to his word, ten minutes later both of our CT scans were finished. By three-ten that afternoon, when the radiologist called down to confirm that neither Katie nor I had a skull fracture, concussion, or cervical spine injury, the ER trauma doctor unstrapped our foam cervical collars, the Charge Nurse pulled the dividing curtain between Bay 3 and Bay 4 all the way open, and the orderlies pushed our two hospital beds right up against each other with the inner side rails lowered.

The instant the beds locked together and the doctor raised the heads of our mattresses to forty-five degrees, Katie and I didn't just hold hands—we leaned across the narrow seam between the two hospital mattresses and wrapped both of our arms tightly around each other's shoulders in the long, deep grounding hug we had needed ever since we hit the hallway floor at school.

Seconds later, walking into the combined ER bay alongside the emergency physician was Dr. Evelyn Carter, wearing her white coat and carrying the thick manila lab folder from her clinic across the medical plaza.

"First things first—the head and cervical spine CT scans for both Nathaniel and Katie are completely clean," Dr. Carter announced with a warm, relieved smile as Katie and I eased back against our pillows with our inner hands locked together between our beds and fresh ice packs resting against the matching goose eggs on our foreheads. "Nurse Callahan followed the exact right protocol calling EMS after a dual head strike on a concrete school floor, and thank goodness neither of you suffered a fracture or intracranial bleed."

Then Dr. Carter stepped to the foot of our two ER beds and tested the reflexes and motor response in our knees, calves, and ankles.

Just like on the hallway floor outside Room 112 at Northwood High School, when she tapped our patellar tendons and asked us to lift our shins against her fingers, our lower legs didn't budge.

Dr. Carter pulled a rolling stool up beside our two beds, opened the thick manila lab folder containing the genetic sequencing and nerve-conduction studies that had arrived from Norfolk that morning, and looked at Dad, Katie, and me with deep, solemn compassion.

"David, Nathaniel, Katie," Dr. Carter said quietly, "two and a half weeks ago, when you came to see me the Monday morning after your cruise, I told you that Nathaniel and Katie's legs were walking on borrowed time—and that they would eventually need power wheelchairs. We had scheduled your three o'clock checkup today to review these test results and talk about transitioning to powerchairs."

She looked straight into my eyes, and then into Katie's.

"What happened in the B-Wing hallway at Northwood High School at one-fifteen this afternoon wasn't a temporary spell, and it wasn't just end-of-the-week fatigue," Dr. Carter said gently. "Your borrowed time is up. Neither of your legs can support your body weight anymore, and from this afternoon forward, neither of you can ever try to stand or walk again—because trying to push yourselves up will only cause another collapse like the one that sent you to the Emergency Room today. It is officially time for powerchairs."

Even though Katie and I had known in our hearts from the second we reached for each other's hands on that linoleum floor that our walking days were over, hearing Dr. Carter say the words out loud made everything real. Beside me, Katie's fingers tightened around mine between our two hospital beds, and I squeezed her hand right back with everything I had.

"Tell us what the test results showed, Evelyn," Dad said steadily, standing right between our beds with one hand resting on my shoulder and the other on Katie's. "Why did their legs give out completely today, and what does it mean for their arms?"

"When you two were toddlers," Dr. Carter explained clearly, "your uneven balance was diagnosed as mild spastic diplegic cerebral palsy. Because mild CP is static and non-progressive—and because your mother always brushed off any new symptoms—nobody realized that your early balance issues were masking a second, genetic condition that both of you inherited as fraternal twins: a juvenile-onset progressive axonal motor neuropathy."

Dr. Carter pointed to the nerve-conduction graphs inside the folder.

"In this condition, the longest motor nerves in the body—the ones running from the lower spine down to the feet, ankles, calves, and quadriceps—lose their electrical signal amplitude first, and the sixteen-year-old adolescent growth spurt pushes those nerves past their threshold," Dr. Carter said. "Today at school, those lower-extremity motor nerves finally dropped below the threshold required to keep your knees locked upright. And as you both felt when you tried to push yourselves up off the hallway floor and crumpled the second time, the neuropathy is also causing progressive weakness in your shoulders, biceps, and forearms—which is why standard manual wheelchairs that you have to push with your hands are out of the question."

"What about our fingers, Dr. Carter?" Katie asked, her voice small but brave as she held onto my hand. "Are we still going to be able to type on our computers and write Quantum Basic code?"

Dr. Carter's face warmed with an immediate, reassuring smile.

"Yes, Katie—and that is the best news in your entire lab packet," Dr. Carter answered. "As long as we stop you from straining your shoulders and wrists trying to lift your body weight or push manual wheelchair rims, your fine finger dexterity at a keyboard will remain intact for years to come. You will both be able to type, write computer code, use a mouse, and hold hands—and with a fingertip joystick on your power wheelchair armrests, you'll be able to glide through Northwood High School all day without tiring your arms at all."

Dr. Carter pulled three prescription and accommodation forms from her folder and signed them right on the bedside tray table.

"First," Dr. Carter said, "I have signed an urgent hospital prescription for two SwiftChair compact, portable take-apart power wheelchairs—small-footprint motorized chairs with ten-inch drive wheels, right-hand armrest joysticks, and removable battery boxes and seats that you can break down to fit inside the trunk of your sedan, David, along with a smooth composite transfer sliding board so Nathaniel and Katie can slide horizontally from their wheelchair seats onto the back seat of the car or onto their beds without ever putting weight on their legs. Second, Hospital Physical Therapy is bringing up two loaner wheelchairs and a transfer board right now so Dad can take you home safely tonight until the custom powerchairs are delivered in two weeks. And third, here is your updated Section 504 Plan for Northwood High School: elevator keys, duplicate classroom textbooks so you never lift a heavy bag, and full-time wheelchair access starting Monday morning."

Dad picked up the signed forms, then leaned down between our two hospital beds and wrapped one arm around Katie and one arm around me, kissing the top of Katie's head and then mine just above our bruised foreheads.

"I was never so scared in my life as when Mr. Brooks called me and said you two were headed to the Emergency Room," Dad whispered, his voice thick with emotion as he held us both close. "Wait until you see how fast I learn to break those two powerchairs down for the trunk of the car. Your legs may have run out of borrowed time today, but as long as the three of us have each other, nothing is going to stop you."

Part 3: Two Compact Power Wheelchairs in the Trunk, Downsizing to Military Highway, & CVTA Route 15

Date: 2001-10-06 at 13:10 America/New_York

Saturday, October 6, 2001, 1:10 PM — Two Compact Power Wheelchairs in the Trunk & Our New House off Military Highway

"Unclip the two under-seat battery boxes first, pull the quick-release pins to lift both padded seats off their posts, fold the backrests and footrests flat, and set the two compact motorized drive bases side by side in the trunk with two inches to spare under the hinges," Dad said with a proud grin on the first Saturday of October, wiping his brow as he demonstrated how both of our brand-new SwiftChair compact portable power wheelchairs broke down to fit inside the open trunk of our silver-blue Holt sedan.

Sitting side by side on the back bench seat of our Holt sedan with the rear passenger doors swung wide open to the concrete driveway of our new rental house and our inner hands clasped together, Katie and I watched Dad practice the disassembly routine he had timed with his wristwatch all morning.

Four days earlier, the seating clinic had delivered the two compact, take-apart power wheelchairs Dr. Carter had prescribed for us after our legs gave out for good in the hallway at Northwood High School—nimble, small-footprint power bases with ten-inch solid drive wheels, under-seat battery packs, and feather-light right-hand armrest joysticks that let us glide down the long corridors of school with a gentle nudge of one finger without ever straining our wrists or shoulders on manual hand rims. Because Dr. Carter had documented our progressive axonal motor neuropathy down to the millimeter, Dad's health insurance had covered ninety percent of the chairs.

What health insurance didn't cover, however, was a vehicle to carry them assembled.

A full-size conversion van equipped with a hydraulic wheelchair lift or fold-out side ramp cost upwards of thirty-five thousand dollars—an astronomical sum that might as well have been thirty-five million on Dad's tight budget. Between trying to finish his computer science degree at the Community College of Hampton Roads, losing Brenda's paycheck—meager as her income had been—and getting stuck with the crushing credit card debt from the seven-day Caribbean cruise that Brenda had booked behind his back, Dad was scraping by to make every dollar count.

Thankfully, because the seating clinic had ordered portable take-apart power chairs whose battery packs, seats, and drive bases separated into manageable thirty-five-pound components—and had supplied us with a smooth composite transfer sliding board that bridged the gap between the wheelchair seat and the back seat of our family Holt sedan—we could still get around by car without a lift van. Whenever we drove somewhere, Katie and I would roll our compact power chairs right up to the open rear passenger door, switch off our joysticks, flip up the inner armrest, and slide horizontally across the transfer board onto the back bench seat with Dad's steadying hands before buckling our three-point seatbelts while Dad broke both chairs down like a pit crew and loaded the bases, battery boxes, and folded seats into the trunk.

Even so, Dad had been completely honest with Katie and me around the kitchen table two weeks earlier when he opened his budget ledger.

Without a second income—and with the cruise credit card bill and legal fees hanging over our heads—we couldn't afford the mortgage on our old two-story house anymore. More importantly, even if we could have paid for it, our old house had fourteen steep wooden stairs leading up to the bedrooms and the only full bathroom—stairs that neither Katie nor I could ever climb again now that the borrowed time in our legs had run out.

So Dad had put the two-story house up for sale—using the modest equity to wipe out Brenda's cruise debt completely and fund the small walk-away settlement check that Mr. Vance had conditioned on Brenda signing the Code of Virginia Section 20-121.4 divorce stipulation reverting to her maiden name, Walsh, so that just as Katie and I had asked, she no longer carried the Prairie name—and spent every evening for two weeks poring over rental listings, Virginia Beach school-zone boundary maps, and printed bus schedules from the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority.

What Dad found was a stroke of pure logistical genius: a small, single-story brick ranch house for rent on Arvin Road at the corner of Indian River Road just off Military Highway, right where Virginia Beach met Norfolk and Chesapeake.

First, the rent was nearly four hundred dollars a month less than our old mortgage, bringing our monthly bills comfortably inside Dad's budget while he finished school at CCHR. Second, every single room in the little house—the living room, the eat-in kitchen, the hallway bathroom with its roll-up sink and shower transfer bench, and our bedrooms—sat on one flat ground floor, with a gentle aluminum ramp Dad had bolted over the two brick front porch steps. Third, because the house sat just inside the western edge of Northwood High School's zoned attendance boundary, Katie and I didn't have to change high schools in the middle of our Junior year, and a lift-equipped Virginia Beach school bus could pick us up right at the end of our driveway every weekday morning.

And fourth—the detail Dad was proudest of as he reassembled our two compact power wheelchairs beside the open rear doors of the car, locked the seats onto their posts, and dropped the battery boxes back into place—was what ran right along Indian River Road and the massive eight-lane corridor of US-13 (Military Highway) at the end of our block.

“Slide back into your chairs and let’s head out to the corner on Military Highway before the one-twenty-five bus gets here,” Dad said, closing the trunk lid of the Holt sedan, helping Katie and me slide across the transfer board from the back seat into our waiting power chairs, and holding up a yellow-highlighted paper pamphlet folded in his hand. “Since Route 15 stays strictly out on Military Highway and doesn’t turn into the neighborhood streets, I want to show you two how fast we can get out to the main road without having to break your power chairs down at all.”

Clicking our lap belts shut and flipping our armrests back down, Katie and I pressed the green power buttons on our armrest joysticks and hummed side by side down Arvin Road to Indian River Road behind Dad. In less than three minutes, we reached the corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road, where four lanes of northbound traffic and four lanes of southbound traffic roared past a raised center median.

Saturday, October 6, 2001, 1:25 PM — Catching CVTA Route 15 on Eight-Lane Military Highway

“Look at the timetable right here under Military Hwy. & Indian River Rd.,” Dad said over the steady hum of eight-lane highway traffic as the three of us stopped beside the metal bus stop post in the crisp October sunshine, unfolding the printed CVTA Route 15 — *Naval Base Norfolk / Robert Hall Blvd. schedule so both Katie and I could read it.

Holding Katie’s left hand with my right hand between our two compact power wheelchairs, I leaned in with my sister to follow the yellow highlighter line Dad had drawn across the grid of numbers.

“Wait a second,” Katie said, her eyes widening as she traced the columns from left to right. “It runs every thirty minutes all day Monday through Saturday?”

“Like clockwork,” Dad smiled, tapping each column with his index finger. “Going northbound up Military Highway, Route 15 stops right across the highway at Military Highway and Indian River Road at :01 and :31 past every hour from six-thirty-one in the morning until six-thirty-one at night, and then once an hour until ten-thirty-one. In exactly fourteen minutes—at :15 and :45 past the hour—it drops you right at the doors of Glenrock Mall, where you can transfer to Routes 20, 23, 25, or 27, or stay right on Route 15 past Glenrock Shopping Center, Little Creek Road, and Hampton Boulevard all the way to Naval Base Norfolk.”

“And what about going southbound on our side of the road?” I asked, looking at the lower table where Dad had highlighted two alternating rows in yellow and green.

“That’s the best part,” Dad said, pointing to the bold route note printed across the center of the timetable: On arrival at Old Emerald Creek Rd. and Military Hwy., every other trip will alternate between Robert Hall and Emerald Creek Mall Monday through Saturday. “Southbound buses leave Glenrock Mall at :15 and :45 past the hour and get right here to Military Highway and Indian River Road ten minutes later, at :25 and :55 past every hour. Every bus that stops here at :25 past the hour—like the 1:25 PM bus coming down the right-hand lane right now—turns onto the Emerald Creek Mall branch and puts us at the mall entrance twenty minutes later at 1:45 PM. And every bus that stops here at :55 past the hour goes straight down to Robert Hall Boulevard and Tidewater Square by :15 past the next hour."

Right on cue, signaling across the four southbound lanes of US-13 (Military Highway) toward our curb was one of the classic forty-foot high-floor workhorses of the fleet: a 900-series Beacon V transit bus (Fleet #914) that operated alongside the agency's high-floor MetroCoach buses. Because Tidewater Regional Transit (TRT) on the Southside and Peninsula Transit (PenTran) across the harbor had only merged two years earlier in October 1999 to form the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority (CVTA), Bus #914 was still wearing its original 1990s TRT paint scheme—a crisp white body banded with horizontal navy-blue and green stripes down its flanks—with a rectangular CVTA logo vinyl decal sticker applied right next to the front boarding doors below the 15 EMERALD CREEK MALL destination sign.

As Bus #914 hissed to a stop parallel to the concrete curb, the bi-fold front doors swung open. Because the 900-series Beacon V was a true high-floor bus whose main passenger deck sat three full feet above the street at the top of a three-step stairwell, there was no sloped ramp. Instead, standing high up on the elevated driver's platform, the uniformed operator pulled the parking brake knob, flipped up the two forward priority benches behind the driver's area, and switched on the Elevate-U electro-hydraulic stairwell wheelchair lift.

"Afternoon, folks! Welcome aboard The 15," the operator called down warmly from the elevated doorway as the three deep front steps flattened into a level horizontal steel elevator platform, telescoped outward on twin vertical hydraulic lift arms with yellow-and-black tubular side handrails, and lowered straight down to rest flat on the concrete sidewalk before dropping the yellow outer safety barrier flap flush against the curb. "Come on onto the elevator platform one at a time—I've got both wheelchair bays folded up and ready for you!"

Katie and I glanced at each other with identical grins. Nobody had to struggle with a car transfer, and Dad didn't have to unclip battery boxes or lift thirty-five-pound power-chair bases into a trunk. Giving Katie's hand a quick squeeze before letting go for thirty seconds, I nudged my right-hand joystick forward and rolled my compact power chair onto the flat horizontal steel platform between the two side handrails first; the outer yellow safety barrier flipped up behind my rear wheels to lock me in, the twin vertical hydraulic arms raised my chair straight up three feet in the air like an elevator to the high interior floor of Bus #914, and I backed neatly into the right-hand securement bay. Seconds later, the elevator platform lowered straight back down to the sidewalk for Katie and lifted her power chair right up to the high deck across the aisle from me before folding seamlessly back into three staircase steps so Dad could climb up into the bus and drop our fares into the farebox.

Once the operator had clicked the four-point floor straps onto both of our power-chair frames, the front doors hissed shut and Bus #914 merged back into the four southbound lanes of Military Highway.

Across the center aisle of the high-floor bus, Katie reached her left hand out over her armrest, and I reached my right hand out to meet hers, our fingers lacing together in the warm afternoon sunlight streaming through the tall transit windows.

“We don’t need a thirty-five-thousand-dollar van to go wherever we want, Nate,” Katie said softly over the deep diesel rumble of the Beacon V engine as we cruised south toward Emerald Creek Mall. “Between the school bus on weekdays, breaking our chairs down for the trunk of Dad’s car, and Route 15 out on Military Highway at the end of our block, we’ve got the whole city back.”

“And a house with zero stairs,” I agreed, squeezing my sister’s hand as Dad smiled at the two of us from the seat beside her. “We’re going to be just fine.”

Sixteen on Four Wheels & Finding Dates

Part 1: Navigating Northwood High on Four Wheels, Two First Dates, & Why We Ride on Saturday

Date: 2001-10-15 at 07:10 America/New_York

Monday, October 15, 2001, 7:10 AM — Rolling the “Blue Mile” & The Brass Elevator Key

“Keep your speed dial on two until we clear the Commons tiles, Nate, or the vibration is going to rattle our teeth right out of our heads,” Katie said with a wry smile on Monday morning as the two of us rolled our compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs through the pinned-open double fire doors of Northwood High School.

Beneath our ten-inch solid drive wheels, the textured quarry tiles of the Northwood High Commons buzzed like a washboard before giving way to the smooth, polished linoleum of the main academic corridor everyone called the “Blue Mile.”

It was the start of our second full week navigating eleventh grade on four wheels instead of two feet, and physically, the difference was like night and day.

Back in September, walking from the morning bus loop to first period had left our calves cramping, our knees trembling, and our shoulders aching from the weight of our backpacks before the first bell even rang. Now, thanks to the Section 504 Medical Mobility Plan that Dr. Carter had signed and Dad had walked into the principal’s office, neither Katie nor I carried a single textbook between classes. A duplicate set of our Junior-year textbooks sat on a designated shelf in each of our classrooms, and clipped to our lanyard ID badges alongside our house keys were two shiny brass Vanguard Elevator keys issued by the school custodian.

Socially, however, showing up to your Junior year of high school in matching power wheelchairs was like dropping a boulder into the middle of a swimming pool.

As Katie and I glided side by side down the right-hand lane of the Blue Mile with our right index fingers resting lightly on our armrest joysticks, the noisy wall of lockers ahead of us reacted the exact same way it had all last week. Conversations dropped to sudden, awkward whispers as we rolled past. Kids who had known us since sixth grade either stared straight down at their sneakers as if looking at a power wheelchair might be rude, or leaped three feet out of our path against the lockers as though we were driving runaway forklifts.

When we reached the B-Wing stairwell at the end of the hall—where two hundred students were jostling up the concrete steps toward the second floor—I pulled my brass key on its retractable lanyard reel, inserted it into the keyhole beside the heavy gray door of the school's service elevator, and turned it clockwise.

With a slow mechanical clunk, the sliding metal door rattled open, releasing the familiar scent of lemon floor wax and damp mop buckets. Katie and I rolled our compact power chairs straight inside side by side, and as the door slid shut, sealing out the roar of the stairwell, Katie reached her left hand across the two inches between our armrests and laced her fingers through mine.

"Did you see Todd Jenkins jump into the water fountain alcove when we turned the corner by the trophy case?" I asked as the old hydraulic elevator groaned upward toward the second floor at roughly half a mile an hour.

"He nearly knocked his own varsity jacket off his shoulder," Katie laughed, squeezing my hand as the floor indicator light blinked from 1 to 2. "Remind me again why we used to be afraid of using this elevator?"

"Because we didn't know how nice it was to get to second period without our legs shaking," I said honestly as the elevator chimed and the door rattled open onto the upstairs landing. "See you at eleven-forty at our table?"

"Count on it," Katie smiled, giving my hand one last squeeze before we released our fingers and steered in opposite directions down the hall—Katie toward first-period U.S. History, and me toward first-period English.

Monday, October 15, 2001, 11:45 AM — Head Over Heels for Heather & Katie's Guarded Heart

"You were smiling all the way from the milk cooler to the table, Nate," Katie teased gently four hours later as the two of us parked our compact power wheelchairs side by side at the open end of our sunlit corner cafeteria table and clicked our joystick motors off. "Let me guess: Heather Collins sat next to you in second-period Computer Lab again?"

I felt my ears turn warm all the way to the tips as I set my brown paper lunch bag beside our spiral Quantum Basic notebook.

"She moved her chair right next to my power chair for the whole ninety-minute block," I admitted, unable to keep the grin off my face as I poked Katie's straw into her apple juice box for her and handed it across our armrests. "When everybody else in the row stepped around my wheelchair like it was radioactive, Heather didn't even blink. She showed me wallet photos of her family, helped me pick a color palette for our Quantum Basic menu screen, and asked if I wanted to sit with her at the computer table every day this semester."

The truth was, I wasn't just crushing on Heather Collins—at sixteen years old, I was completely, head-over-heels in love with her. From the first week of Junior year in Room 204, Heather had treated me with a warm, effortless kindness that made my heart race every time she walked through the classroom door.

Beside me, Katie took a sip of her juice box, her expression softening with genuine happiness for me before a quieter, more thoughtful look crossed her face.

“What about Ryan Miller in third-period Chemistry?” I asked, reaching my right hand across the gap between our chairs to take Katie’s left hand on the laminate tabletop. “You said on Friday that he kept leaning across the lab bench to talk to you.”

“He did again today,” Katie said, though her voice was noticeably more reserved than mine. Ever since seventh grade—when Brandon had dumped her in the middle of the hallway and left her sobbing beneath the blue butterfly in her bedroom—Katie had kept a careful, protective wall around her heart when it came to boys. “Actually, while we were cleaning up our beakers at the accessible lab sink, Ryan asked if I wanted to go out with him to Emerald Creek Mall this weekend. And he asked if you had a girlfriend you wanted to bring along so we could make it a double date.”

My breath caught in my throat. Neither Katie nor I had ever been on a real high-school date before. Before our legs gave out in September and we got our compact power wheelchairs, Katie and I had gone to both Emerald Creek Mall and Chesapeake Bay Mall all the time—with Chesapeake Bay Mall out on Lynnhaven Parkway always being our favorite “big trip” mall (which we still hadn’t visited yet since getting our powerchairs), and Emerald Creek Mall becoming our favorite regular teenage hangout because we only needed to ride a single bus from Military Highway to get there.

“Wait—what did you tell him?” I asked.

“I told him I’d talk to you at lunch first,” Katie said carefully, her fingers tightening around mine. “Honestly, Nate, I don’t know about Ryan. He’s nice enough when we’re lab partners, but I can’t tell if he actually likes me or if he just likes having someone who balances his chemical equations for him. Still… I see the way your whole face lights up whenever you talk about Heather. And if we go together as a double date on Saturday afternoon, neither one of us has to go through our first high-school date alone.”

“Why Saturday specifically?” I asked, glancing at the calendar inside my binder.

“Because I checked Dad’s printed CVTA Route 15 schedule on the refrigerator this morning,” Katie explained, tapping the timetable notes she had copied into the margin of our notebook. “Remember the alternating branch rule at Old Emerald Creek Road and Military Highway? Route 15 only serves Emerald Creek Mall Monday through Saturday. On Sundays, every single trip runs straight down to Robert Hall Boulevard and skips Emerald Creek Mall completely. So if we want to take the bus to the mall ourselves, it has to be on Saturday.”

“Then let’s do Saturday,” I said earnestly, squeezing her hand so she knew my promise from seventh grade hadn’t changed one bit. “I’ll ask Heather in Computer Lab on Wednesday morning, and you tell Ryan we’ll meet them at the Emerald Creek Mall upstairs food court at twelve-forty-five on Saturday. And Katie—if Ryan acts weird for even one second, you and I have our bus fare in our pockets and each other right beside us.”

Wednesday, October 17, 2001, 10:05 AM — Two Very Different Reactions

“A Saturday afternoon double date at Emerald Creek Mall with you and Katie?” Heather Collins repeated on Wednesday morning in second-period Computer Lab, her warm hazel eyes lighting up with an immediate, genuine smile that made my chest feel weightless. “I would love to, Nate! How are you and Katie getting over to Emerald Creek?”

“We live right near Military Highway and Indian River Road now, so we’re taking CVTA Route 15 at twelve-twenty-five,” I explained honestly, bracing myself just in case a high-school girl thought riding the city bus on a first date was uncool. “The high-floor bus has a hydraulic wheelchair lift in the front stairwell, so Katie and I can roll our power chairs right aboard together without Dad having to break them down for the trunk of his car.”

Heather didn’t flinch or look embarrassed for a fraction of a second. Instead, her smile grew even warmer.

“That is so smart—my dad can drop me off at the main mall entrance at twelve-forty, and I’ll ride the back glass elevator right up to the second-floor food court to meet you and Katie,” Heather said brightly, reaching over to touch the sleeve of my flannel shirt. “I can’t wait for Saturday, Nate.”

Two hours later at Fourth-Block lunch, however, when Katie rolled up to the corner table and parked beside me, I could see immediately from the tight set of her jaw that her conversation with Ryan Miller in third-period Chemistry had gone very differently.

“Ryan agreed to meet us at twelve-forty-five on Saturday,” Katie said quietly, unwrapping her sandwich and taking my right hand across the table, “but we didn’t even make it out of the Chemistry lab before he got weird about two things.”

“What did he say?” I asked, frowning.

“First, when I told him we were meeting at Emerald Creek Mall, Ryan puffed his chest out and said, ‘Oh, I’ll drive over to your house in my coupe and pick you up—just fold your wheelchair up and throw it in my trunk,’” Katie recounted, shaking her head in disbelief. “I tried to explain to him twice that a motorized power wheelchair with a battery box and solid drive wheels doesn’t just fold flat like an umbrella stroller, and that even if Dad disassembled it into four pieces, it wouldn’t fit inside a two-door sports coupe.”

“And what was the second thing?” I asked.

“When I told him that you and I were riding CVTA Route 15 to the mall together because we always travel as a pair,” Katie said, her blue eyes steady and guarded as she looked at me, “Ryan frowned and said, ‘Wait—you’re bringing your brother on the bus instead of riding with me? Don’t you ever go anywhere without Nate?’ I looked him straight in the eye and told him, ‘No, Ryan. Nate is my twin brother, and he comes first.’ He backed down and said he’d meet us at the food court at twelve-forty-five, but… I have a feeling Saturday is going to be a very short test for Ryan Miller.”

Part 2: Cousin Wesley, Ryan's Escalator Exit, & Two Dates at Emerald Creek Mall

Date: 2001-10-20 at 12:45 America/New_York

Saturday, October 20, 2001, 12:45 PM — The Second-Floor Food Court & Cousin Wesley

"Nate! Katie! You guys made it right on time!" Heather Collins called out with a radiant smile at twelve-forty-five on Saturday afternoon, waiting for us on the terracotta-tile landing right outside the brushed-brass sliding doors of the freestanding early-1980s glass elevator on the main retail concourse—its warm cream-colored corner columns framing multi-pane glass and topped with a small glass pyramid cap beneath the white steel roof trusses—right where the elevator connected the first floor of the main concourse up to the second-floor food court wing of Emerald Creek Mall.

Twenty minutes earlier, Dad had walked with us out to the corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road, pressed a twenty-dollar bill into each of our hands, and waved from the sidewalk as Katie and I rode the Elevate-U hydraulic stairwell wheelchair lift aboard the 12:25 PM Saturday southbound CVTA Route 15 (Bus #914). Right on schedule at 12:45 PM, the high-floor Beacon V bus had dropped us off at the bus stop on the mall's outer ring road, straight across the parking lot from the first-floor exterior entrance of Wellington's, the two-story anchor department store at the end of the wing. Rolling side by side from the ring road through the ground-floor cosmetics and apparel aisles of Wellington's into the first-floor main concourse, Katie and I had rolled right into the glass-backed scenic elevator directly in front of the department store's mall entrance and ridden it up to the second floor.

Before I could even click my joystick speed dial down to one on the upper landing, Heather stepped straight up to my compact SwiftChair power wheelchair, leaned down without a trace of hesitation, and wrapped her arms around my shoulders in a warm hello hug that sent my heart soaring into the skylights.

"Hi, Nate," Heather said softly against my cheek before straightening up and smiling just as warmly at my twin sister. "And hi, Katie! My dad dropped me off at the lower Wellington's entrance and I rode the glass elevator right up here from the first-floor concourse so we could roll into the food court wing together—and whenever we go downstairs to browse the lower level, I'm riding the elevator right alongside you two."

"Thanks for waiting for us by the elevator, Heather," Katie said, her guarded posture relaxing noticeably at how naturally Heather included both of us and had zero problem being seen riding the mall elevator with two kids in wheelchairs.

Turning 180 degrees away from the glass elevator and the two-story interior entrance of Wellington's behind us on the main retail concourse, the three of us rolled straight into the bustling second-floor food court wing—where the high white tented fabric canopy ceiling and skylights echoed with weekend chatter, the far exterior glass exit doors at the back of the wing opened straight out onto the graded upper section of the mall parking lot that gently sloped up to the second-floor level, and Bobby Vanguard's 1982 synth-pop classic "Moving Up the Escalator" drifted down from the PA speakers above the food court escalators—just as Ryan Miller strolled over from the brass-and-glass mezzanine railing in his letterman jacket.

Unlike Heather, Ryan didn't look thrilled to see our two compact power wheelchairs rolling side by side.

"Hey," Ryan said, glancing down at Katie's motorized drive wheels as we picked a four-top table positioned right on the tile concourse between the two central escalators—with the up escalator rising from the first floor on Katie's and my side, and the down escalator descending to the first floor on Heather's and Ryan's side—and pulled two plastic chairs away so Katie and I could park our power chairs side by side facing Ryan and Heather. "Katie, I still don't get why you made me meet you here instead of letting me pick you up in my car. You seriously couldn't just fold that chair up and stick it in my trunk?"

"Ryan, I told you on Wednesday—it's a power wheelchair," Katie replied evenly, tapping the black battery box beneath her seat. "It has electric motors and heavy batteries. It doesn't fold up like a beach chair, and Nate and I ride Route 15 together."

Ryan let out a loud, skeptical sigh, slumping into his seat across from Katie as Heather and I brought back our lunch trays from Crown Burger and Annie's Pretzels.

Halfway from the counter to the table, the progressive neuropathy weakness in my left forearm flared under the weight of the plastic food tray. My left wrist trembled, tipping my large cola cup toward the edge of the tray. Instantly—without me having to say a single word—Katie glided her power chair half a foot to her right, slid her left hand under the corner of my tray to steady it onto the table, pinched open the paper wrapper on my straw, and laced her left fingers through my right hand between our armrests while my wrist tremor settled.

Across the table, Ryan stared at our joined hands as if we had just committed a felony.

"Are you kidding me right now, Katie?" Ryan snapped, setting his burger down on its wrapper and leaning forward across the table. "First you refuse to ride in my car unless your brother comes along, and now you're sitting here holding his hand and opening his straw while you're supposed to be on a date with me? Who's number one here—me or your brother?"

The noisy food court seemed to fade into background static around our table. Beside me, Katie didn't flinch, and she didn't let go of my hand.

"Nate is number one in my life, Ryan," Katie said clearly, looking him straight in the eyes. "He is my twin brother. We've been through everything together, and he is always going to come first."

Ryan scoffed, his face flushing red as he turned toward Heather next to him, clearly expecting her to back him up. "Heather, are you seeing this? Doesn't it bother you that your date is sitting here holding his sister's hand and acting like they're glued together?"

Heather looked at Ryan with calm, unmistakable steel in her hazel eyes—and then reached across the tabletop to lay her right hand warmly over my left hand.

“No, Ryan, it doesn’t bother me one bit,” Heather said firmly. “In fact, I love how close Nate and Katie are.”

Ryan blinked at her. “What? Why?”

“Because my fourteen-year-old cousin Wesley—my mom’s sister’s son—is severely developmentally disabled,” Heather explained, her voice steady and proud as she looked from Ryan to Katie and me. “Wesley and I grew up together, and whenever the two of us go anywhere, I hold Wesley’s hand, I hug him, and we look out for each other the exact same way Nate and Katie do. If I ever screamed at Nate or got jealous of him for holding his twin sister’s hand and hugging her, I would be disrespecting the exact relationship I have with Wesley.”

Heather turned her gaze back to me, her eyes shining with so much warmth and affection that my throat went tight.

“I knew before I ever said yes on Wednesday that Nate and Katie travel as a pair,” Heather continued softly. “And watching the way they take care of each other only makes me love Nate more.”

Saturday, October 20, 2001, 1:20 PM — Ryan’s Escalator Exit & “Did You Bring Two Dates?”

Ryan stared from Heather to Katie and me, his ego visibly bruised beyond repair as he realized neither girl at the table was going to bend to him.

“Whatever,” Ryan muttered bitterly, shoving his plastic food-court chair back across the quarry tile and standing up. “If I wanted to play second fiddle to your twin brother and a pair of wheelchairs all afternoon, I would’ve stayed home. Have fun riding the city bus, Katie.”

Heather, Katie, and I watched in silence as Ryan snatched his jacket off the back of his chair.

Beside me, Katie kept her chin up, but I felt the slight tremor in her left hand where her fingers were still laced with mine, and I saw the hurt glistening at the corners of her blue eyes. Even though Katie had stayed guarded with Ryan all week—and even though part of her had figured from the start that this wouldn’t work—having a boy walk out on her in the middle of a crowded food court still stung.

And then Ryan did something that turned my blood to ice.

Because our table sat right between the two central escalators—with the up escalator on Katie’s and my side, the down escalator right on Heather’s and Ryan’s side, and the glass elevator back behind us—the entrance to the down escalator was to Ryan’s immediate right as he stood up from his chair. Instead of walking back toward the elevator or the upper-level parking-lot doors, Ryan turned to look directly at Katie sitting in her compact power wheelchair, took two steps to his immediate right, and stepped deliberately onto the moving metal steps of the down escalator—riding it down to the first floor in a massive, calculated show of disrespect because he knew Katie's disability made it physically impossible for her to follow him down those stairs.

As the top of Ryan's head sank below the second-floor floorplate on the escalator, a long, quiet breath left Katie's lips.

"I kind of figured before we even got off the bus today that it wouldn't work with him," Katie admitted quietly, blinking back the moisture in her eyes as she looked down at her lap belt. "Still… taking the escalator just to rub it in that I can't follow him was pretty low."

"It wasn't just low, Katie—it was disgusting, and he didn't deserve five minutes of your time," Heather said immediately, stepping around the corner of the table to rest a gentle, supportive hand on Katie's shoulder while I squeezed Katie's left hand with everything I had. "And we are not letting him ruin our Saturday. Come on—finish your pretzels, and let's the three of us go walk the second floor of the mall together!"

Katie looked up at Heather in surprise, then glanced at me.

"You're sure you don't mind me tagging along on your date, Heather?" Katie asked softly.

"Are you kidding? You're not tagging along—we're a team today," Heather smiled warmly.

Ten minutes later, after we cleared our trays, the three of us rolled out of the food court and into the wide, sunlit second-floor concourse of Emerald Creek Mall. I rolled down the center of the polished terrazzo walkway in my compact power chair, with Katie rolling right beside my left armrest holding my left hand, and Heather walking right beside my right armrest holding my right hand.

Halfway past the Oak & Iron Outfitters and The Literary Alcove upper-level windows, three guys from our Junior-year History and English classes at Northwood High School—Marcus, Devon, and Chris—came walking out of the music store carrying CD bags.

None of the three had ever had a class with Katie and me at the same time, so they had no idea Katie was my twin sister—and as their eyes landed on me rolling down the mall in my power wheelchair flanked by two pretty sixteen-year-old girls holding both of my hands, all three of them stopped dead in their tracks.

Marcus grinned from ear to ear and gave me an impressed salute.

"Whoa, Prairie—save some for the rest of us, man!" Marcus laughed, nudging Devon's elbow as they walked past. "Did you seriously bring two dates to Emerald Creek Mall today?!"

For one second, Heather, Katie, and I blinked at each other—and then all three of us burst out laughing so hard that every bit of the sadness Ryan had left behind vanished into the vaulted ceiling of the mall.

“Tell them yes, Nate!” Heather giggled, squeezing my right hand as Katie laughed beside us. “Let the whole eleventh grade think you’re the smoothest guy at Northwood High!”

“With the two prettiest girls in Virginia Beach on either side of my chair,” I grinned, looking from Katie’s bright, restored smile on my left to Heather’s glowing face on my right, “I’m definitely not correcting them.”

Saturday, October 20, 2001, 2:40 PM — A Hug for Me, A Handshake for Katie, & Route 15 Home

We spent the next hour browsing the second-floor music and book aisles at The Literary Alcove together before riding the freestanding glass-enclosed elevator down to the first-floor main concourse at two-forty and rolling out through the first-floor entrance of Wellington’s toward the ring road so Katie and I could catch the 2:48 PM northbound CVTA Route 15 bus back up Military Highway.

Just outside the automatic sliding glass doors in the crisp October sunshine, Heather’s father pulled up to the pickup curb in his burgundy sedan and gave a friendly wave through the windshield. Fifty feet down the wide concrete sidewalk, the blue-and-yellow CVTA bus stop sign stood waiting for the 2:48 PM bus.

Stopping beside us on the sidewalk, Heather turned to me first. Bending down in front of my power chair, she wrapped both arms warmly around my neck and hugged me close, her cheek pressing against mine for a long, unhurried moment.

“Today was the best first date I’ve ever had, Nate,” Heather whispered in my ear before pulling back with a bright smile. “Same computer table on Monday morning?”

“Same computer table on Monday morning,” I promised, my face glowing.

Then Heather turned to Katie’s power wheelchair right beside mine. Instead of giving a polite wave from a distance, Heather stepped squarely in front of my twin sister, met Katie’s blue eyes with genuine warmth and respect, and extended her right hand.

“It was really great hanging out with you today, Katie,” Heather said earnestly. “Next Saturday, maybe the three of us can bring my cousin Wesley along and get pretzels together.”

Katie looked at Heather’s outstretched hand, and a real, unguarded smile broke across my sister’s face as she reached out with her right hand and shook Heather’s hand warmly.

“I’d really like that, Heather,” Katie said. “See you at school on Monday.”

We watched from the sidewalk as Heather climbed into the front passenger seat of her father’s car and waved out the window until the sedan merged onto the ring road. As soon as her dad’s car turned the corner, Katie and I steered our compact power wheelchairs side by side down the sidewalk to the CVTA Route 15 bus stop and laced our inner hands together while we waited for the 2:48 PM high-floor Beacon V bus to round the loop.

“Well,” I said quietly, looking over at my twin sister as the familiar white bus with its horizontal blue-and-green TRT stripes and CVTA door sticker signaled toward our curb, “one out of two first dates wasn’t bad.”

“Are you kidding, Nate?” Katie smiled, squeezing my hand as the bus pulled up and the operator switched on the Elevate-U hydraulic stairwell wheelchair lift. “Finding out in twenty minutes that Ryan was a jerk—and finding out that Heather loves you and gets us completely because of her cousin Wesley? I’d call that a hundred percent success.”

Seventeen, Senior Year, & Greenway Court

Drunken New Year

Part 1: The Gas-Station Run, A Box of Dry Cereal, & Why I Never Had a Twenty-First Birthday Drink

Date: 2002-12-31 at 21:30 America/New_York

Tuesday, December 31, 2002, 9:30 PM — The Broken Ground Rules & The Gas-Station Run

“Brittany, Dad laid down the ground rules before he walked out that front door—nobody is allowed over here while he’s up in Rhode Island, and there is zero alcohol allowed in this house!” I said sharply at nine-thirty on New Year’s Eve, sitting in my compact SwiftChair power wheelchair in the front hallway beside Katie’s chair as our eighteen-year-old maternal cousin Brittany pulled the front door open to the cold December night.

Tonight was supposed to be simple, quiet, and safe.

It was Tuesday, December 31, 2002—the middle of our Senior year at Northwood High School, just over three months before Katie and I would turn eighteen on April 8. Ever since the Friday afternoon in September of our Junior year when the borrowed time in our legs had finally run out in the hallway at school, both Katie and I had used our compact power wheelchairs full-time from the moment we woke up until we went to bed at night.

Up in Newport, Rhode Island—where Dad had grown up, and where his mother, our paternal grandmother, lived alongside Dad’s sister Aunt Elizabeth and our older cousin Chelsea—Grandma had come down with a bad winter bronchitis over Christmas and couldn’t travel south to Virginia on the ARTS train. Because hauling two heavy power wheelchairs nine hours north up Interstate 95 into New England winter weather for a brief New Year’s visit would have been exhausting, Katie and I had stayed home in Virginia Beach while Dad drove up to Newport, Rhode Island to check on Grandma, Aunt Liz, and Chelsea for the New Year. Meanwhile, our eighteen-year-old maternal cousin Brittany—the lone cousin from our estranged mother’s side of the family who hadn’t taken our mom’s side during the divorce and was still allowed to be part of our family—had offered to stay at the house with Katie and me while Dad was out of state so an able-bodied person would be under the roof in case of a winter power outage. Before Dad backed his Holt sedan down the driveway to head north for Rhode Island, he had stood right in the center of our living room and laid down the law: the front door was to stay deadbolted, nobody was allowed over at the house, and Katie, Brittany, and I were supposed to spend New Year's Eve eating pizza, drinking sparkling apple cider, and watching the Times Square ball drop together on television.

Instead, with Dad four hundred and fifty miles away in Newport, Brittany had picked up the cordless kitchen phone.

Now, standing on our aluminum front porch ramp in the porch light were five teenagers Brittany had met earlier that week—along with a tall, scruffy twenty-one-year-old guy named Derek who had just used his vertical driver's license to do a run to the corner gas station out on Military Highway, carrying two heavy plastic grocery bags clinking with glass bottles and cardboard twelve-packs.

"Oh, chill out, Nate—don't be such a pair of babies," Brittany scoffed, waving Derek and the other four kids past our wheelchairs into our small living room. "Uncle David is all the way up in Newport, Rhode Island with your grandma and Aunt Liz until tomorrow night! We'll throw the empties in the outside trash bin in the morning and nobody will ever know unless you two snitch."

"This isn't your house, Brittany, it's ours!" Katie said firmly, her left hand reaching across our armrests to grip my right hand as Derek dumped the plastic bags onto our kitchen counter with a loud crash of bottles. "Our dad works his tail off to pay the rent on this place, and we don't want strangers drinking in our living room!"

"Well, they're already here, and Derek already spent forty bucks at the gas station," Brittany shot back, grabbing two plastic cups from the dish rack as one of her friends cranked the volume knob on our living-room stereo up until the bass rattled the window blinds. "If you two don't want to party, go play on your computers in your room and leave us alone."

Tuesday, December 31, 2002, 11:15 PM — Hiding Behind a Locked Bedroom Door

By eleven-fifteen that night, our living room had devolved into a loud, sour-smelling war zone.

Katie and I had stayed near the hallway threshold as long as we could to make sure nobody broke Dad's things, but as the gas-station bottles emptied over the next ninety minutes, Brittany's guests turned into every kind of drunk at once.

Over on the living-room sofa, one boy in a hooded sweatshirt was already passed out cold with his mouth open and an empty can rolling across the carpet beneath his sneakers, while a girl beside him was slumped sideways over the armrest, half-conscious and groaning that the room was spinning. Near the kitchen doorway, Derek and another guy in a baseball cap had turned mean and belligerent—shouting profanities inches from each other's faces and shoving kitchen chairs out of the way in an angry argument over who owed whom ten dollars for the gas-station run. And right in the middle of the rug, Brittany and her friend Jenna were completely loopy—stumbling into the coffee table, slurring every third word, and cackling at the top of their lungs as they spilled sticky soda and liquor across the floor.

For Katie and me, the smell of stale alcohol drifting down the hallway and the sound of angry, slurred shouting inside our own home hit every raw nerve left behind by our mother on the cruise ship sixteen months earlier.

When Derek slammed his palm against the kitchen wall so hard that the framed family photos in the hallway crooked on their nails, Katie looked at me with wide eyes and gripped my wrist.

"Nate, I don't want to be out here near them anymore," Katie whispered over the roar of the stereo and the shouting. "If Derek or that other guy trips over our wheelchairs while they're fighting, neither of us can stand up to get out of the way."

"Grab that unopened box of dry cereal off the lower pantry shelf so we have food for the rest of the night and don't have to come back out here," I told her immediately, snagging two cans of ginger ale on my lap tray while Katie tucked the family-size box of toasted oat cereal onto her lap. "We're locking ourselves in your room for the night."

As we backed our two compact power wheelchairs down the short hallway toward Katie's bedroom at the back corner of the house, one of Brittany's guests—a loudmouth senior from Northwood High named Tyler who had been chugging out of a plastic cup by the stereo—spotted us retreating and stumbled down the hall after us.

"Hey! Where do you two think you're rolling off to?" Tyler slurred, thrusting a red plastic cup toward my face as I steered Katie inside the bedroom ahead of me. "Come on, Prairie, stop acting like you're too good for the rave and take a drink!"

"We don't drink, Tyler—stay out of our hallway," I told him flatly.

Before Tyler could take another step, I backed my power chair across the threshold into Katie's bedroom, swung the solid wooden bedroom door shut right in his flushed, angry face, twisted the brass privacy lock until it clicked, and wedged the heavy rubber doorstop beneath the bottom gap.

On the other side of the oak panel, Tyler banged his fist twice against the door and yelled spitefully over the bass of the stereo, "Fine, lock yourselves in a bedroom all night, you stuck-up losers! See if anybody cares!"

For good measure, once Katie and I used our armrests to transfer onto the edge of her bed side by side beneath the framed blue butterfly print from our old house, I used my joystick to inch my fifty-pound power wheelchair right up against the inside of the doorknob like a steel roadblock.

Even through the closed door, we could still hear the muffled thudding of boots, the angry shouting from the kitchen, and the loopy, off-key shrieking from the living room.

Pulling Katie's green-and-gold quilt around both of our shoulders, I opened the top flaps of the cardboard cereal box between us so we had handfuls of dry cereal to munch on for dinner, switched the small thirteen-inch television on her dresser to the GBS New Year's Eve broadcast from Times Square with the volume turned low, and wrapped my right arm around my twin sister's shoulders while my left hand held hers.

Wednesday, January 1, 2003, 12:00 AM — Why I Never Had a Twenty-First Birthday Drink

"Ten minutes to midnight," Katie murmured, resting her blonde head against my shoulder as the crowd in Times Square cheered on the small screen and another loud crash of glass echoed from the kitchen on the other side of our locked bedroom door. "Can you believe we have to hide in a locked bedroom in our own house on New Year's Eve because Brittany couldn't follow one simple rule?"

"If Dad were anywhere in Hampton Roads tonight, we would have quietly called him from the bedroom phone an hour ago and asked him to come to the house immediately," I said quietly, glancing at the cordless extension handset on Katie's nightstand beside the two unopened cans of ginger ale we had brought into the bedroom on our lap trays. "With him nine hours north in Newport with Grandma, Aunt Liz, and Chelsea, calling him right before midnight wouldn't get him down Interstate 95 tonight—it would just scare him half to death while he's stuck in Rhode Island. First thing in the morning, though, we're calling him, and Dad is going to hit the roof."

For a long moment, I sat there listening to the contrast between the two sides of that bedroom door: out in the living room, kids our age were passed out on the floor, screaming at each other in drunken rage, or stumbling around out of their minds—while in here, Katie and I were safe, clear-headed, and holding onto each other.

Up until that exact night at seventeen years old—four months shy of my eighteenth birthday in April—I had always assumed that when it came to alcohol, I was just waiting until my twenty-first birthday like everybody else to have my first legal drink. I was a rule-follower by nature; I didn't break laws, so I had figured that once I turned twenty-one, I'd probably try a glass of beer or wine just to see what the big deal was.

Sitting on the edge of that bed with Katie's hand in mine, listening to Derek's slurred shouting and Brittany's loopy giggling through the drywall—and remembering the look on our mother's face on Deck 4 of the Sunward Tropics right before she landed in the ship's brig—something settled permanently inside my chest.

"Katie?" I said softly as the digital clock on the television screen ticked to 11:59 PM and the glittering crystal ball began its sixty-second descent down the flagpole in Times Square.

"Yeah, Nate?" Katie asked, looking up at me.

"You know how I always said I was waiting until my twenty-first birthday to have my first legal drink?" I said, popping the tabs on our two cold cans of ginger ale and handing one to my sister. "Listening to what's going on in our living room tonight—some of them passed out cold, some of them furious and trying to fight each other, some of them acting like they lost half their brains—I don't ever want to end up like that. Not even once. When we turn twenty-one, I'm not having a twenty-first birthday drink. I'm never touching the stuff for the rest of my life."

Katie looked at the can of ginger ale in her hand, then looked up into my eyes with a fierce, unmistakable pride.

"Me neither, Nate," Katie said, clinking her ginger ale can gently against mine just as 12:00 AM — HAPPY NEW YEAR 2003 flashed across the small screen and confetti snowed over Times Square. "Why would either one of us ever put something in our bodies that turns people into that—when we can stay sharp, write our code, and take care of each other?"

"Happy New Year, Katie," I whispered, setting my ginger ale on the nightstand and pulling my twin sister into a tight, two-armed hug under the quilt.

"Happy New Year, Twin Brother," Katie whispered back, hugging me tight beneath the quilt while the drunken shouting in the living room finally began stumbling out toward the street—the two of us holding fast behind our locked bedroom door until morning light, when one quiet phone call up to Newport, Rhode Island was going to make sure Brittany never set foot inside our home again.

Part 2: The Drunken New Year Lie, Heather's Bitter Goodbye, & Twin Sisters Always Stay

Date: 2003-01-06 at 08:05 America/New_York

Monday, January 6, 2003, 8:05 AM — Blindsided Outside Room 204

"Save it, Nathaniel—don't you dare roll up to my locker with that innocent smile on your face and pretend you didn't do anything wrong!" Heather Collins snapped at five minutes past eight on Monday morning, slamming her locker door shut so hard that the metal vents rattled down the second-floor hallway of Northwood High School.

My right thumb froze on the joystick of my compact SwiftChair power wheelchair, bringing my chair to an abrupt halt three feet from her locker outside Room 204.

It was Monday, January 6, 2003—the very first morning back at school after winter break. Because Heather's parents had taken her and her cousin Wesley up to the Shenandoah Valley to visit her grandparents between Christmas and New Year's Day, I hadn't seen her in person for over a week. All morning long on the CVTA Route 15 bus ride and up the school elevator with Katie, I had been grinning from ear to ear, carrying a small folded note in my jacket pocket asking Heather if she wanted to meet Katie and me at Emerald Creek Mall that coming Saturday afternoon.

Instead, as Katie rolled her power chair up beside mine in the busy hallway before first period, I found myself staring into a face I barely recognized.

The warm, gentle girl who had held my hand on the second-floor bridge of the mall, who had defended my bond with my twin sister because of how fiercely she loved her cousin Wesley, was staring down at me with hard, glassy eyes and a jaw clenched so tight her chin was trembling.

“Heather, what’s wrong?” I asked, completely blindsided as my stomach dropped into my shoes. “Did something happen over break? I don’t even know what you’re talking about!”

“Oh, you don’t know what I’m talking about?” Heather laughed—a short, jagged, bitter sound that made several students walking past us turn their heads. “Really, Nate? Look down the hall by the stairwell!”

I glanced over my shoulder toward the east stairwell. Leaning against the cinderblock wall in his varsity jacket with a smug, spiteful smirk plastered across his face was Tyler—the loudmouth senior who had stumbled down our hallway with a red plastic cup on New Year’s Eve and banged his fist on Katie’s bedroom door when we refused to join Brittany’s drunken rave.

“Tyler was in my homeroom ten minutes ago bragging to half the senior class about the wild New Year’s Eve rave at your house off Military Highway,” Heather said, her voice shaking with a cold, venomous fury that cut straight through the hallway chatter. “He told everybody how you got yourself and some girl wicked drunk on gas-station liquor, locked the two of you inside a back bedroom with a chair wedged against the doorknob, and spent the whole night hooking up behind a locked door while the party went on outside!”

For two full seconds, my brain couldn’t even process the sheer absurdity of what I was hearing.

“What?!” I gasped, staring at her in disbelief. “Heather, that’s a complete lie! Neither one of us drank a single drop of alcohol!”

“And you know what the worst part is, Nate?” Heather cut me off, her voice cracking with bitter humiliation as angry tears welled in the corners of her eyes. “When Tyler first started laughing in homeroom about how you locked yourself in a back bedroom all night with a girl, I actually defended you! I immediately assumed you were in that room with Katie—because I know the two of you always stick together and look out for each other! I looked right at Tyler in front of everybody and said, ‘That was his twin sister Katie, you idiot!’ And Tyler looked me dead in the eye, laughed in my face, and told the whole room it wasn’t Katie—that it was some blonde girl from the party who got wasted with you before you locked the door in his face!”

Beside me, Katie’s blue eyes went wide with outrage.

“Heather, Tyler only saw the back of my blonde head from the hallway before Nate shut the door in his drunken face!” Katie spoke up immediately, rolling her power wheelchair six inches forward to put herself right alongside me. “It was me in that bedroom! Our maternal cousin Brittany—the one cousin on our mom’s side our dad still allowed in our house after the divorce—broke every ground rule and invited strangers with alcohol over while our dad was up in Newport, Rhode Island visiting our sick grandmother, our Aunt Liz, and our cousin Chelsea! If our dad had been anywhere in Hampton Roads, we would have quietly called him to come to the house immediately—instead, Nate and I grabbed an unopened box of dry cereal out of the pantry and locked ourselves in my bedroom all night just to stay safe until we called our dad in the morning and he threw Brittany out of our lives for good! Tyler was furious that Nate wouldn't drink with him or join the rave—he's lying to get back at us!"

I reached into my jacket pocket with a shaking hand, desperate to make Heather hear the truth.

"Heather, please, listen to me—Katie's telling the absolute truth!" I pleaded, my chest aching as if someone had dropped a cinderblock onto my sternum. "We ate dry toasted oat cereal out of a cardboard box and drank two cans of ginger ale while watching the ball drop on a thirteen-inch TV! I literally promised Katie at midnight that I'm never even having a twenty-first birthday drink because watching Tyler and those kids act like drunken idiots disgusted me so much! You know me, Heather—how could you ever believe I would get drunk or cheat on you?"

Slowly, painfully, I realized from the cold, shuttered look on Heather's face that the damage was already done.

Sitting in front of twenty kids in homeroom while Tyler laughed in her face and told everyone her boyfriend was locked in a bedroom all night with another girl had humiliated her to the core—and once that bitter poison had taken root in her chest, no amount of truth about a cardboard box of dry cereal was going to undo it.

"Save it for somebody gullible enough to buy it, Nathaniel," Heather said coldly, stepping back from our two wheelchairs as the five-minute warning bell rang overhead. "I stuck up for you in front of everybody because I thought you were different from every other guy at this school, and you made me look like a complete fool. Don't call my house, don't wait for me at the bus loop, and don't ever talk to me again. We're done."

Before I could get another word out of my throat, Heather spun on her heel, walked briskly down the hallway past Tyler—who flashed me one last triumphant, nasty grin before disappearing into his classroom—and vanished around the corner toward the science wing.

Monday, January 6, 2003, 3:45 PM — Roles Reversed Under the Blue Butterfly

All through first period, lunch, and afternoon classes, I felt like I was moving underwater.

What hurt more than anything wasn't just that my very first relationship had ended in less than sixty seconds on a Monday morning—it was the crushing, helpless injustice of being condemned for the exact opposite of who I was. I had followed every rule my father had laid down; I had protected my twin sister from a living room full of reckless drunks; I had sworn off alcohol for the rest of my life; and yet because one angry liar wanted revenge for having a bedroom door closed in his face, the girl I had been head over heels in love with for a year and a half now hated my guts without ever knowing I was innocent.

By the time the CVTA Route 15 Beacon V bus lowered us down the Elevate-U hydraulic stairwell lift onto the sidewalk along Military Highway at three-thirty that afternoon and we rolled up the aluminum ramp into our house, the knot in my throat was so tight I could barely breathe.

Without saying a word, Katie steered her power chair ahead of me down the short hallway into her bedroom—the exact same room where we had hidden six nights earlier—and patted the edge of her mattress beneath the framed blue butterfly print on the wall.

Just like we had done on that afternoon in seventh grade when Chad had dumped Katie in the cafeteria of Bayside Middle School—except with our roles completely reversed—we locked our wheelchair brakes side by side and transferred onto the edge of her bed.

As soon as I sat down, I buried my face in my hands, my shoulders shaking as the bitter sting of Heather's final words replayed in my ears.

Beside me, Katie didn't lecture me or tell me to tough it out. Instead, she wrapped both of her arms tightly around my shoulders, pulled my head down against her shoulder, and rested her cheek against my blonde hair while her hand rubbed slow, steady circles across my back.

"It isn't fair, Katie," I choked out against the sleeve of her sweater, my voice breaking in the quiet bedroom. "I didn't even know what she was talking about when I rolled up to her locker. We were sitting on this exact bed eating dry cereal out of a box to stay away from Tyler's booze, and she thinks I betrayed her."

"I know, Nate. I was right there with you every single second," Katie whispered fiercely, holding me with every ounce of strength in her seventeen-year-old arms. "Tyler is a vindictive jerk who couldn't stand that you wouldn't act like an idiot with him, and if Heather threw away everything she knew about your character over one drunk liar's story without even listening to the two of us, then she didn't deserve my brother's heart in the first place."

I lifted my head, wiping my eyes with the back of my wrist as I looked at my twin sister.

In seventh grade, when Chad had walked out on Katie and left her crying in the middle school hallway, I had held her right under that same framed blue butterfly print and promised her that I would never leave her behind. Now, five years later at seventeen—with both of our power wheelchairs parked side by side at the foot of the bed—Katie reached out, laced the fingers of her left hand tightly through my right hand, and gave me the exact same unbreakable anchor.

"Remember what you told me in seventh grade when Chad broke my heart, Nate?" Katie said softly, her blue eyes locked onto mine. "Boyfriends and girlfriends can walk away over a rumor in a sixty-second hallway conversation. Twin Sisters never walk away. You and I know the truth about who you are, and we've got each other for life."

Taking a long, steadying breath, I squeezed Katie's hand back and leaned my head against her shoulder until the shaking in my chest finally subsided—knowing beyond a shadow of a doubt that as we headed toward high school graduation and our adult lives together, the only person in the world I would ever completely trust was sitting right beside me.

Greenway Court, Apartment A6 & The Square Closet Sanctuary

Part 1: Apartment A6 on Greenway Court, Dad's Microwave Cart, & Across-the-Hall Neighbors

Date: 2003-07-16 at 07:40 America/New_York

Wednesday, July 16, 2003, 7:40 AM — Dad's Rolling Cart & Our Own Set of Keys in Apartment A6

"Careful with the power cord on the toaster, Nate—tuck it through the back wire loop so it can't snag on your armrest when you turn around by the stove," our father said cheerfully at twenty minutes to eight on Wednesday morning, tightening the last chrome corner bolt on the two-shelf rolling utility cart he had just assembled beside our tiny kitchenette counter.

Sitting side by side in our compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs inside Apartment A6, Katie and I watched with huge grins as Dad lifted our new countertop microwave onto the top shelf of the cart, set our two-slice chrome toaster right next to it, and plugged both cords into the wall outlet above the speckled laminate counter.

"Look at the clearance on that," Katie said happily, rolling her wheelchair forward to test the reach. Without leaning an inch off her seat cushion, she popped open the microwave door with her left hand and tapped the toaster lever with her right. "Now we still have the whole counter square above the dorm fridge free for making sandwiches!"

"That's the whole idea," Dad smiled, wiping his forehead with the back of his sleeve as the through-wall box air conditioner mounted into the red brick directly below our wide, three-pane white-framed rear window hummed steadily in the July heat. "When a studio kitchen only gives you a four-burner stove, a single sink, and an under-the-counter dorm refrigerator, you two need every square inch of prep space at seated height."

We had turned eighteen on April eighth and rolled across the graduation stage of Northwood High School a month ago in June. Because our estranged mother Brenda had spent the spring calling our dad's house in Virginia Beach and threatening to track us down the second we turned eighteen and were no longer covered by the family-court custody order, Dad had quietly gone apartment hunting across the city line in the tree-lined West Ghent neighborhood of Norfolk.

At the beginning of July, Dad had introduced us to Dave and Deb—the husband-and-wife landlords who owned this quiet, two-story flat-roofed red-brick building on Greenway Court, where Apartments A1 through A10 sat downstairs on the first floor and Apartments B1 through B10 sat upstairs on the second floor. Even better, Dad had signed the lease and paid the rent for Apartment A6 himself so that Katie and I could finally have a safe, independent home to call our own as eighteen-year-old college freshmen.

Every detail of the building and our studio fit our daily lives like a glove. Out front, beneath the black lamppost on the grass walkway, the building's recessed glass-and-aluminum main entrance door stayed locked twenty-four hours a day and required our brass apartment key to open—meaning nobody from the street could wander into the interior hallway uninvited. Just inside the front lobby past the row of locking metal mailboxes, Dave had bolted down a short, nonslip aluminum modular ramp over the three shallow rubber-treaded lobby steps so Katie and I could roll our power wheelchairs straight up into the first-floor hallway without a bump.

Down at the very back of the first-floor hallway—directly opposite Apartment A5—our wooden door opened into Apartment A6. All twenty apartments in the building shared the exact same enlarged bedroom-style rectangular studio layout, with units on opposite sides of the hallway like Apartment A5 and Apartment A6 built as exact mirror images of each other, giving us plenty of open floor space for two wheelchairs to pivot side by side. Against the side wall stood the full-sized bed we shared and our long workstation desk holding our shared desktop computer tower and seventeen-inch CRT monitor. Along the front corner sat our small kitchenette with its stove, sink, under-the-counter dorm fridge, and Dad's brand-new microwave-and-toaster cart. Tucked off to the side were two doors: one leading into our square walk-in closet with its soft carpeted floor, and the other opening into an accessible bathroom equipped with a roll-under sink, a toilet, and a standing shower where Dad had placed a sturdy padded transfer bench and a handheld shower sprayer within easy reach.

"Alright, you two, I've got to get across the river to work before traffic backs up on Interstate 264," Dad said, picking up his tool bag and kissing the top of Katie's head before squeezing my shoulder. "Remember, keep the front lobby door latched behind you whenever you go out to catch the Route 2 bus on Hampton Boulevard, and call me tonight after you test out the microwave."

"Thank you for the cart, Dad—and for giving us our own place," I said, rolling beside Katie to see him to the door.

"You two earned it," Dad said warmly. "Have a great morning."

Wednesday, July 16, 2003, 7:48 AM — Familiar Faces Across the Hall in Apartment A5

"Come on, Nate—let's roll out with Dad as far as the front sidewalk while the morning air is still cool," Katie suggested, slipping her brass Greenway Court key lanyard around her wrist. "I want to see how the cell signal is out by the grassy field across the street before we call CCHR about our fall books."

"Good call," I agreed, glancing at the single bar of reception on my flip phone—the thick red-brick walls of the Greenway Court building blocked half the cellular towers in West Ghent whenever we were inside Apartment A6.

I pulled our wooden apartment door open, rolled my SwiftChair out into the quiet first-floor hallway right behind Dad and Katie, and turned to pull our deadbolt shut.

At that exact second, the heavy deadbolt of Apartment A5—directly across the narrow back hallway from our door—let out a loud metallic thunk.

The door to Apartment A5 swung open, and out stepped an eighteen-year-old guy with side-parted golden-blond hair, glasses, and a stiff, slightly uneven gait in his legs, flanked closely by an eighteen-year-old girl with a shoulder-length blonde bob, a protective posture, and her hand steadying his elbow.

For two full seconds, all four of us froze in the back hallway between Apartment A5 and Apartment A6.

I stared at the guy's wire-rimmed glasses and the unmistakable way he stood shoulder-to-shoulder with the girl beside him. He stared down at our two compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs, then up at Katie's and my matching platinum-blonde hair.

"Wait a second," I blinked, my jaw dropping as nine years of neighborhood and school memories clicked into place at once. "Michael? Michael Ragsdale?!"

Behind his wire-rimmed glasses, Michael's eyes went wide with genuine shock, and the tight, guarded tension in his shoulders vanished on the spot.

"Nathaniel? Katie?!" Michael said, recognizing us immediately from three doors down on Delaney Street and our childhood two-week summer camp at Virginia Dominion University—as well as the hallways of Northwood High School, where all of us had just graduated a month earlier. "You two live in A6?!"

"We just moved in at the start of the month!" Katie beamed, lifting a hand in a friendly wave from her armrest—since neither she nor I ever liked being touched by anyone outside the two of us and our dad—as she smiled at Michael and at Ashley Raybourn, whom we recognized from our graduating class at Northwood High. "Our dad rented A6 for the two of us so we'd have our own place near the Route 2 bus line! Don't tell me you two just moved into A5?!"

"We literally got the keys from Deb last night," Ashley laughed, a huge, relieved smile breaking across her face as she looked from Katie and me to our dad. "We were just heading outside across the street to the grassy field so we could get three bars of cell service to call Michael's mom before the moving truck gets here at nine."

"That's the exact reason we were rolling outside right now!" I grinned, holding up my flip phone with its lone, stubborn bar of signal. "The brick walls in the back of the building eat every cell signal alive!"

Dad chuckled warmly, shaking Michael's and Ashley's hands in the hallway before we all headed down the corridor together, rolled smoothly down Dave's nonslip aluminum ramp over the three rubber-coated lobby steps, and pushed out through the locked glass-and-aluminum front entrance door into the sunny July morning.

While Dad waved goodbye from his pickup truck in the decal-controlled parking lot, Katie and I rolled across the quiet street with Michael and Ashley to the open grassy field where neighbors were walking their dogs among the slatted wooden benches. Parking our two power wheelchairs right flush against the ends of the wooden bench where Michael and Ashley sat pressed side by side, we spent the next twenty minutes catching up like old teammates—talking about how Michael's sisters Jessica and Rachel were out in Washington State, how Katie and I were starting our freshman classes together at the Community College of Hampton Roads on the bus, and how relieved both pairs of us were to have a locked front building door and a quiet rectangular studio where nobody could bother us.

When we finally waved to Michael and Ashley as they headed off to meet Michael's mom and the moving truck, Katie and I rolled back across Greenway Court, unlocked the glass front door with our brass key, and wheeled back into the cool, air-conditioned sanctuary of Apartment A6.

"Can you believe that, Nate?" Katie smiled as the deadbolt clicked shut behind us and the aroma of fresh toast drifted from our new rolling cart in the kitchenette. "Out of every apartment building in the entire city of Norfolk, our old neighbor from Delaney Street and VDU summer camp is right across the hall from us in A5."

"Best across-the-hall neighbors we could ever ask for," I agreed, parking my wheelchair beside hers at our shared computer workstation desk.

Part 2: Brenda in the Back Alley & Discovering the Square Closet Sanctuary

Date: 2003-08-09 at 20:45 America/New_York

Saturday, August 9, 2003, 8:45 PM — Footsteps Behind the Exterior Iron Stairs & Hiding in the Square Closet

"Wait—turn the speakers down, Nate," Katie whispered sharply at a quarter to nine on Saturday evening, her hand dropping onto my wrist over the computer mouse. "Listen."

I clicked the mute icon on our seventeen-inch CRT monitor at the shared workstation desk, leaving only the low, steady hum of the through-wall box air conditioner mounted into the brick below our wide three-pane rear window.

Outside in the narrow first-floor back alley—right behind the black iron exterior fire-escape staircase that climbed the rear brick wall of our Greenway Court building beside the bushes and trash bins—an angry, slurred woman's voice echoed off the brick.

"I know their father rented them an apartment in this building!" our estranged mother Brenda's voice rasped in the humid August dusk, followed by the crunch of her shoes on the gravel behind the iron stairs. "Stupid locked front door won't even let a mother into the lobby to see her own eighteen-year-old kids! Katie! Nathaniel! Which window is yours?!"

My blood turned to ice water in my veins. Beside me at the computer desk, Katie's fingers clamped around my forearm so tightly I could feel her pulse racing against my skin.

Even though we had kept the white horizontal mini-blinds tilted shut over the wide three-pane window above our through-wall air conditioner, Apartment A6 sat on the first floor at the very back of the building. If Brenda stepped two paces past the black iron exterior stairs and pressed her face against the glass beside the bushes, even the faintest glow from our desk lamp or our computer monitor would tell her immediately that Apartment A6 was ours—and she would bang on our back window and scream in the alley all night long.

“Kill the lamp and the monitor,” Katie breathed silently in my ear, her voice barely above a whisper. “If the room is pitch dark and dead silent when she looks through the blinds, she’ll think the apartment is empty.”

In less than three seconds, I reached behind the tower to flip the master rocker switch on our surge protector—plunging the CRT monitor and the desk lamp into instant darkness—while Katie clicked off the small stove hood light over the kitchenette.

Outside in the back alley, Brenda’s footsteps crunched closer toward the iron stairs, her knuckles rapping sharply against one of the rear brick window frames down the wall.

“The square closet,” Katie whispered, pointing through the shadows toward our open closet door. “Grab the sleeping bag and the pillows off the bed—if we’re inside the closet with the door closed, she won’t see a single shadow or hear our chairs even if she shines a flashlight through the window slats.”

Moving in silent, practiced twin synchronization, I pulled our soft navy-blue sleeping bag and two pillows off the full-sized bed while Katie guided us across the dark studio carpet to the doorway of our square walk-in closet. Quickly spreading the sleeping bag and pillows flat across the square carpeted floor inside the closet, Katie and I parked our two compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs side by side just outside the closet frame, switched both joystick controllers completely off so their green battery-level LEDs wouldn’t glow in the dark, and transferred smoothly down onto the closet floor.

Reaching up from inside the shared sleeping bag, I pulled the solid wooden closet door shut until the latch clicked softly into place.

Inside the square closet, the darkness was total and absolute.

Katie immediately turned on her side inside the sleeping bag, wrapped both arms tightly around my shoulders, and pulled my head against her chest while I wrapped my arms around her waist—holding each other with every ounce of steady, deep-pressure warmth we had so neither of us would tremble or make a sound.

Thirty seconds later, through the muffled layers of the closed closet door and the rear brick wall, we heard Brenda’s footsteps stop right behind the exterior iron staircase outside our back window, just above our humming through-wall air conditioner.

We heard her fingernails tap twice against the exterior glass of Apartment A6. We heard her mutter a bitter curse under her breath when she saw nothing but dark, empty blinds and heard nothing over the drone of the air-conditioning compressor. Two minutes later, her footsteps retreated down the back alley toward Raleigh Avenue, and the distant slam of a car door told us she had finally given up and driven away.

Even after the alley went quiet, neither Katie nor I moved to open the closet door.

Wrapped together inside our shared sleeping bag on the carpeted floor of that small, enclosed square closet, something remarkable happened to our nineteen-thousand-rpm fight-or-flight nervous systems. Out in the open studio room, the streetlamp shadows on the blinds and the knowledge that someone could walk down the back alley always left a tiny background thread of vigilance running in our autistic brains. Inside the enclosed four walls of the square closet, zipped up together in the velvet dark with Katie's arms locked securely around me, the outside world couldn't touch us at all.

"Are you okay, Nate?" Katie whispered against my hair in the pitch dark, her hand rubbing slow, soothing circles between my shoulder blades.

"More than okay," I whispered back, letting out a long, sleepy breath as every tense muscle in my back and legs finally melted into the carpet. "It's so quiet in here, Katie. I actually feel completely safe."

"Me too," Katie murmured, resting her chin against my forehead as a soft yawn escaped her lips. "We don't have to move back out to the bed tonight if you don't want to. Let's just stay right here in our little fortress."

Resting my head against my twin sister's shoulder inside our shared sleeping bag on the square closet floor, I closed my eyes—and for the first time since moving out on our own, both of us slept nine uninterrupted hours straight through the night without waking up once.

From that August night forward, that compact square closet literally became our bedroom. Yes, we still had our full-sized bed out in the main studio apartment, kept neatly made up under its quilt—but it rarely ever got used. For both of us on the autism spectrum, sleeping cuddled up together inside our single shared navy-blue sleeping bag in the snug, confined space of the closet made us feel completely secure in a way an open room never could—a habit that would stay with the two of us for the rest of our lives.

Part 3: Hurricane Isabel, Two Layers of Sandbags at Greenway Court, & Two Weeks at Dad's House on Arvin Road

Date: 2003-09-17 at 15:15 America/New_York

Wednesday, September 17, 2003, 3:15 PM — Unplugging Apartment A6, Seeing Michael Sad Across the Hall, & Two Layers of Sandbags at the Top of the Lobby Ramp

"Make sure both twenty-four-volt battery chargers are in the front zipper pocket of the duffel bag, Nate," our forty-five-year-old father said inside Apartment A6 at three-fifteen on Wednesday afternoon, September 17, 2003, lifting our desktop computer tower off the workstation desk and setting it high on the center of our full-sized bed mattress beside our seventeen-inch CRT monitor. "On the radio coming through the tunnel, Coastal Virginia Transit Authority just announced they're suspending all bus service across Norfolk and Virginia Beach tonight ahead of Hurricane Isabel, and the National Weather Service advisory says the storm surge up the Elizabeth River could hit eight feet above normal low tide tomorrow afternoon."

Sitting in her compact black SwiftChair power wheelchair beside the open door of our under-the-counter dorm refrigerator, eighteen-year-old Katie handed me the last carton of milk and the cheese drawer to pack into Dad's blue insulated cooler.

"We unplugged the microwave and the toaster on the rolling cart too, Dad," Katie said, wiping the inside of the dorm fridge dry with a dish towel before propping its door open an inch so it wouldn't mildew if the power went out. "And Nate already rolled up our navy-blue sleeping bag from the square closet floor so we can bring it to Arvin Road."

"Good thinking, sweetheart," Dad smiled, zipping the sleeping bag into a heavy plastic protective bag and resting his hand comfortably on the rear push-handle of Katie's wheelchair to help ease her chair back two feet around the cooler in the narrow kitchenette aisle. "Besides getting you two away from the Elizabeth River flood zone, our house on Arvin Road is already registered on Commonwealth Power's Medical Priority list for your electric wheelchairs, so if the storm knocks the power lines down, we'll be on the priority list to get our electricity turned back on."

Neither Katie nor I ever liked being touched by anyone we didn't know. With strangers, classmates, or neighbors, even an unexpected pat on the shoulder or someone reaching for our wheelchair push-handles made our skin crawl and set off every alarm bell in our autistic nervous systems. Between the two of us, of course, it was the exact opposite—Katie and I held each other's hands across our armrests whenever we rolled side by side and hugged each other tight inside our shared sleeping bag every night—and both of us were completely comfortable when our dad helped maneuver our wheelchairs over tight thresholds or into the floor tie-downs of his van.

When Dad pulled our solid wooden hallway door open so Katie and I could roll our two SwiftChairs out into the back of the first-floor corridor with our backpacks strapped behind our seats, the heavy brass deadbolt of Apartment A5—directly across the narrow hall from our door—clicked shut at the exact same moment.

Standing in front of Apartment A5 with a canvas backpack slung over his shoulders and his brass key ring in his hand was eighteen-year-old Michael Ragsdale.

Both Katie and I noticed the change in him immediately.

Back in mid-July and August, whenever we had seen Michael in the hallway or out by the grassy field across Greenway Court, Ashley Raybourn had been right beside him—her shoulder pressed against his, steadying his uneven Cerebral Palsy gait and grounding him the exact same way Katie and I grounded each other. At the end of August, however, Ashley had packed her bags and left Norfolk to start her freshman year away at college. Michael's mom had already picked up his one-eyed black Lab rescue Archie earlier that morning to keep the dog safe during the hurricane, leaving Michael all by himself in the empty mirror-image studio across the hall.

Even behind his glasses, you could see how sad and hollowed-out Michael looked without Ashley there.

Katie reached her right hand across the gap between our wheelchairs and laced her fingers tightly through my left hand. Both my sister and I felt a quiet, genuine ache in our chests for our old Delaney Street and summer-camp neighbor—yet both of us also knew there was nothing we could do to help him. Neither Katie nor I could go over and give someone a hug without our own sensory wiring locking up, and even if we could have, we knew that nobody in the hallway could replace the safe person he was missing.

“Hey, Nathaniel. Hey, Katie, Mr. Prairie,” Michael said quietly, shifting the strap of his backpack. “Are you guys heading out to your dad’s house in Virginia Beach before the wind picks up?”

“Just locked up A6 and lifted the computer onto the bed,” I told him warmly from my chair while Katie gave him a gentle, sympathetic wave with her free hand from her armrest. “Dad’s taking us over to Arvin Road for the storm. Are you getting out of West Ghent before CVTA shuts the buses down tonight?”

“Yeah,” Michael nodded, glancing once down the hallway toward the front door. “I’m walking up to Hampton Boulevard right now to catch the Route 2 bus downtown, transferring to the Route 6, and then taking the Route 12 out to Kemps River Drive. My cousin Maria is meeting me there—she’s going to take me to Crown Burger to grab food before everything closes, and then I’m staying at her house in the downstairs bedroom until the storm passes.”

Just then, heavy footsteps clomped down the interior stairs from the second floor, and the twenty-something guy who lived in Apartment B5—directly upstairs from Michael’s apartment—squeezed past us carrying two plastic bags of ice and a cardboard case of beer back up toward the second-floor landing.

“You first-floor folks are evacuating already?” the neighbor from B5 called down cheerfully over the stair railing. “A bunch of us up on the second floor are throwing a hurricane party tonight! We’ve got candles, flashlights, and three coolers on the landing!”

Dad shook his head with a polite, dry smile as the B5 door slammed upstairs. “A hurricane party two blocks from the Elizabeth River with an eight-foot storm surge in the forecast. Come on—let’s get down the ramp while the streets are still dry.”

When the four of us reached the end of the first-floor hallway at the top of the lobby ramp, we saw why our landlords, Dave and Deb, had parked their pickup truck right up against the front curb walk.

Working side by side in canvas work gloves inside the front entrance door, Dave and Deb were stacking two full layers of heavy burlap sandbags right across the top of the lobby ramp and the three shallow rubber-coated steps—forming a solid, double-tiered barrier separating the lower entrance lobby and the wall of metal mailboxes from the elevated first-floor apartment corridor.

“Wait right there a second, David—let me leave the center gap at the top of the ramp open until Katie and Nathaniel roll down!” Dave called out, wiping the sweat from his forehead as he and Deb steadied the burlap sacks and Dad placed his hands smoothly on the rear push-handles of my chair and then Katie’s to help guide our front caster wheels past the two layers of sandbags, down the modular lobby ramp past the mailboxes, and out through the front glass door. “The city says the river tide tomorrow afternoon is going to push higher than the 1933 hurricane. Even if floodwater pushes through the front glass door into the lower lobby and reaches the mailboxes, two layers of sandbags right here at the top of the lobby ramp will keep it out of the first-floor hallway and out of A5 and A6!”

“Thank you for sandbagging the top of the ramp, Dave, Deb,” Katie said earnestly from her wheelchair as we rolled out onto the dry concrete front walkway toward Dad’s silver wheelchair-accessible minivan.

Out on the sidewalk in front of the circular red-brick planter, Katie and I lifted our hands to wave goodbye to Michael as he turned up Greenway Court toward Hampton Boulevard beneath the overcast gray clouds and rising wind to catch his first bus.

“Stay safe at your cousin’s house, Michael!” Katie called out.

“You two stay safe at your dad’s place too!” Michael called back, giving us a small wave before walking up the block.

Once Dad deployed the side fold-out aluminum ramp of his minivan, helped guide both of our SwiftChairs into the middle bay, and clicked all eight floor tie-down straps onto our frames, Katie reached across the narrow aisle between our chairs and held my hand the whole drive across the Elizabeth River to Dad’s house on Arvin Road.

Thursday, September 18 – Friday, September 19, 2003 — Losing Power for Two Days, Dead Wheelchair Batteries, Feeling Undignified Crawling on the Floor, & Dad Crawling With Us at Eye Level

By two o’clock on Thursday afternoon, September 18, 2003, the overnight rainbands had given way to the full eyewall gusts of Hurricane Isabel—battering all of Hampton Roads with howling seventy-mile-per-hour winds and horizontal sheets of torrential rain.

At ten minutes past two, a pole transformer two streets over toward Military Highway exploded with a low green flash against the dark afternoon clouds, and the electricity inside Dad’s single-story brick ranch on Arvin Road went dead.

Two years earlier, right after our legs gave out in September 2001 and Dr. Carter prescribed our full-time electric wheelchairs, Dad had filed a physician-signed Serious Medical Condition certification with Commonwealth Power so that our house on Arvin Road carried an official Medical Priority flag on our residential meter. During ordinary summer thunderstorms or winter ice squalls, that priority flag meant our street always came back online within three or four hours.

Hurricane Isabel, however, was no ordinary storm.

As we listened to the emergency broadcasts on Dad’s battery-powered weather radio Thursday evening while eating grilled cheeseburgers and hot dogs that Dad cooked on the charcoal grill under the sheltered back patio overhang before the food in the dark freezer could thaw, the announcers reported that nearly two million customers across Virginia had lost electricity at once. Hundreds of century-old oaks and tall Virginia pines had snapped across the primary high-voltage transmission lines and substations along Military Highway and Indian River Road. Even with a Medical Priority flag on our meter on Arvin Road, line crews couldn’t energize our neighborhood tap line until tree crews sawed through the fallen trunks and rebuilt the main Kempsville feeder circuit first.

That Thursday night, when the peak of the hurricane roared across Virginia Beach—rattling the windowpanes and sending pine limbs thudding across the roof—Katie and I rolled down the hallway to our old bedroom, spread our shared navy-blue sleeping bag across the floor of the bedroom closet just like we did in our square closet at Apartment A6, transferred down into the sleeping bag together, and held each other tight with the closet door nearly shut until the howling wind finally began to subside toward dawn.

Throughout Thursday night and Friday morning, Katie and I tried everything we knew to stretch the charge on our twenty-four-volt SwiftChair batteries—switching our joystick controllers completely off whenever we stopped moving in the living room or kitchen. Yet twenty-four-volt gel-cell batteries weren't built to run for two days without a wall outlet.

At two-thirty on Friday afternoon, as I was turning my wheelchair around in the hallway outside the bathroom, the battery gauge on my right armrest dropped to a single flashing red LED and let out three sharp warning beeps. Half a second later, the electromagnetic motor brakes clicked shut, and my chair died completely on the hallway carpet.

Twenty minutes later, right beside the living-room sofa, Katie's joystick controller let out the exact same three beeps and went dark.

Dad disengaged the manual freewheel levers on the rear motors so our two dead powerchairs could be pushed out of the center of the hallway, but an unpowered electric wheelchair weighs nearly two hundred pounds and has small, thick motor-drive tires with no manual handrims. Neither Katie nor I could push our own dead chairs an inch, and even Dad could barely wrestle one heavy dead frame across the carpet at a time.

To get to the bathroom, the kitchen, or the living room, Katie and I had no choice: we had to slide down out of our seats onto the floor and crawl everywhere on our hands and knees.

I had never felt anything so undignified in my eighteen years of life.

Just three months ago, Katie and I had rolled across the stage in our caps and gowns to receive our Advanced Studies Diplomas from Northwood High School. We were eighteen-year-old college freshmen at the Community College of Hampton Roads with our own apartment lease in Norfolk—and now, simply because the power company hadn't gotten the street lines back up yet, the two of us were reduced to dragging ourselves down the hallway on our hands and knees like toddlers, our knees rubbing against the carpet and our palms pressing against the cool bathroom linoleum.

When Katie crawled back out of the hallway bathroom on Friday afternoon and sat back against the hallway wall beside me, her cheeks were burning bright red and her blue eyes were shining with hot, silent tears of sheer humiliation.

"I hate this, Nate," Katie whispered, pulling her knees up and hiding her face against my shoulder as I wrapped my arm around her on the hallway carpet. "We're eighteen years old. It feels so undignified having to crawl around on the floor like babies just to use the bathroom."

Down at the end of the hall, Dad stood in the kitchen doorway holding a battery lantern. He looked at the two dead black powerchairs parked uselessly against the wall, and then he looked down at his eighteen-year-old son and daughter sitting huddled together on the floor.

Dad didn't say a word about looking on the bright side, and he didn't stay standing up on his two feet looking down at us.

Instead, Dad set the lantern down on the carpet, walked over to the sofa, and pulled all three thick sofa cushions, a pile of pillows, and two folded blankets down onto the living-room rug. He carried the blue insulated cooler of ice and ginger ale off the kitchen counter and set it right on the floor beside the cushions. Then he walked to the hall closet, pulled out a stack of our favorite board games and card games—Solo, WordSmith, Real Estate Baron, Stage 10, and Suspect—along with two of his yellow legal pads and a handful of mechanical pencils, and set them in the center of the floor cushions.

And then our forty-five-year-old father dropped right down onto his own hands and knees on the hallway carpet and crawled over to Katie and me so that he was completely at eye level with the two of us.

Katie lifted her head from my shoulder, blinking in surprise through her wet eyelashes as Dad crawled right alongside us into the living room on his hands and knees.

"If my two favorite people in the world are traveling on hands and knees until Commonwealth Power fixes the feeder line," Dad said gently, looking straight into Katie's eyes and mine from the exact same height on the carpet, "then I'm traveling on hands and knees right here with you. Nobody in this house is looking down on anybody."

A shaky laugh broke through Katie's tears as she reached out to squeeze my hand, and the crushing knot of embarrassment in my chest loosened all at once.

For the rest of Friday afternoon, Friday night, and Saturday morning, Dad stayed down on the floor at eye level with us—crawling to the kitchen on his hands and knees whenever we crawled, eating peanut-butter sandwiches and potato chips together on the sofa cushions, sketching HTML table layouts on his yellow legal pads, and playing marathon lantern-lit rounds of Solo, WordSmith, and Real Estate Baron where Katie mercilessly bankrupted both Dad and me before bedtime.

And on Friday night before Katie and I crawled into the bedroom closet to sleep in our shared sleeping bag, Dad clicked his mechanical pencil twice and wrote a bold heading across the top of his yellow legal pad by the glow of the lantern.

"First thing Monday morning," Dad promised us from the carpet, "we are going straight to Dr. Carter's office to get an order written for two lightweight, collapsible manual wheelchairs as backups."

Katie glanced from the legal pad to her wrists, flexing her fingers thoughtfully against the sofa cushion. "Dad, even if we had plain manual wheelchairs right now, neither Nate nor I has the wrist or upper-arm strength to push manual hand-rims very far on our own."

“That’s the exact part I was thinking through while we were playing WordSmith,” I added, tapping the edge of Dad’s legal pad. “Dr. Carter’s seating clinic carries those clamp-on right-armrest joystick power-drive kits made for folding manual cross-brace frames—the ones with a compact battery pack clipped underneath the seat.”

Dad’s eyes lit up behind his glasses as he wrote every word down on the pad. “Wait—walk me through how those work if the power goes out.”

“In normal use, we still drive ourselves everywhere with a right-hand joystick without straining our wrists or shoulders, and we’ve got a second set of charged backup batteries ready to go if a SwiftChair ever runs down,” I explained. “If you ever need to put them into the trunk of a regular car, you just unclip the battery box underneath and the manual frame folds flat. And if another hurricane knocks out the grid for days and even the backup battery packs run dry, you flick the hub clutches to manual so the big spoked wheels spin freely—meaning you can push a lightweight manual chair effortlessly with the rear push-handles instead of two-hundred-pound dead powerchairs trapping us on the floor.”

Dad underlined COLLAPSIBLE MANUAL CHAIRS + RIGHT-ARMREST JOYSTICK ATTACHMENTS twice across the top of the yellow sheet. “Done. First thing Monday morning, we’re getting Dr. Carter to write the prescription for the exact pair.”

Saturday, September 20 – Thursday, October 2, 2003 — Stranded Without Wheels on Saturday, Recharging Overnight, Assessing Greenway Court on Sunday, Ordering Our Joystick-Outfitted Manual Chairs, & Setting Up a Medical Priority Flag for Apartment A6

If any of us needed one more reminder of why we couldn’t live without backup manual wheelchairs fitted with joystick attachments, we got it at one-thirty on Saturday afternoon, September 20.

Outside, city chainsaw crews had finally cleared enough fallen oak trees off Military Highway, Indian River Road, and the Norfolk approaches to reopen the main roads—and Dad’s cell phone chimed on the coffee table with a message from Dave and Deb letting tenants know the Elizabeth River floodwaters around Greenway Court had receded enough to come check on our apartments.

Katie and I immediately sat up on the living-room sofa cushions, eager to ride across the river and see whether our studio, our clothes, and our desktop computer in Apartment A6 had survived the eight-foot storm surge.

Then all three of us looked down the dim hallway at our two dead, two-hundred-pound SwiftChairs parked like lead anchors against the drywall—and realized we couldn’t go anywhere.

Electricity still hadn’t come back on Arvin Road. Without power to charge our SwiftChairs, Dad couldn’t even wrestle those dead motorized frames down the front step ramp and up the minivan ramp, let alone push two unpowered two-hundred-pound chairs across a mud-slick Norfolk parking lot. And without folding manual chairs in the house, Katie and I had zero wheels to get from the living room to the minivan or from the Greenway Court curb into our building.

“I could drive over to Norfolk by myself for an hour just to peek inside A6,” Dad offered hesitantly from the carpet, already frowning at his own suggestion as he looked at the two of us stranded on the floor cushions in a dark, unpowered house.

“No, stay here with us, Dad,” Katie said at once, reaching for my hand while Dad nodded in immediate agreement. Neither of us wanted Dad navigating tangled power lines across the river alone while we were stuck helplessly on the living-room rug without working chairs, and Dad had zero desire to leave his eighteen-year-old son and daughter stranded on the floor either. If we had owned lightweight folding manual chairs right then, Dad could have unfolded them in thirty seconds, rolled both of us straight out to the van, and wheeled us right into Greenway Court even with dead batteries. Instead, all three of us had to sit tight on the living-room cushions through Saturday afternoon and wait on the grid.

At six-fifteen that Saturday evening, the amber strobe lights of a Commonwealth Power bucket truck finally flashed through the front bay window on Arvin Road.

Now that tree and transmission crews had rebuilt the main Kempsville feeder line out on Indian River Road, the utility dispatcher’s computer had flagged Dad’s Medical Priority account on Arvin Road and routed a two-man line crew straight down our street to clear a snapped pine limb and slam a new fuse into our pole transformer. Five minutes later, the ceiling lights, the kitchen refrigerator, and the central air conditioning hummed back to life—and Dad went straight to the living-room outlets to plug in both of our twenty-four-volt SwiftChair battery chargers for the night.

Rolling out of our bedroom closet into the hallway in our fully charged SwiftChairs on Sunday morning, September 21, felt like getting our legs and our dignity back all at once.

Right after Dad made us a hot breakfast of scrambled eggs and toast, he deployed the side fold-out ramp of the minivan in the driveway, guided both of our freshly charged SwiftChairs into the middle bay, clicked all eight tie-down straps onto our frames, and drove Katie and me across the Elizabeth River into West Ghent so the three of us could inspect Greenway Court together.

As we turned off Hampton Boulevard, the streets around our neighborhood were littered with snapped tree limbs, coiled utility cables, and drying river silt. Dad parked in the front lot, lowered the minivan ramp, and walked beside us up the concrete path to unlock the front glass entrance door while Katie and I rolled our SwiftChairs right up to the doorway and peered down into the lower lobby.

We saw immediately how close our building had come to disaster—and what had saved it.

During Thursday afternoon’s peak storm surge, a huge volume of Elizabeth River water had pushed through the front glass entrance door into the lower lobby, leaving a dried brown silt waterline across the brick walls and getting right into the lower lobby mailboxes.

Yet right at the top of the lobby ramp and the three shallow rubber-coated steps above the mailboxes, the two layers of heavy burlap sandbags that Dave and Deb had stacked inside the doorway had held like a dam—stopping the floodwater cold and preventing a single drop of water from entering the first-floor hallway or any of the apartments. Once Dad shifted two sandbags aside so Katie and I could roll up

Dave's nonslip lobby ramp and unlock the wooden door of Apartment A6, we rolled inside and saw that our carpet, our kitchenette cart, our square closet, and our computer up on the mattress were one hundred percent dry.

Out by the front walkway as we rolled back outside, our upstairs neighbor from Apartment B5—who had stayed behind with a few other tenants to throw that hurricane party on Thursday—leaned over the second-floor iron railing and called down to us.

"You guys are lucky you went to your dad's house!" the neighbor from B5 told us, shaking his head. "At high tide Thursday afternoon, the river came all the way up over Greenway Court and the parking lot! If you had stayed in the building, you would've been trapped on an island—and if Dave and Deb hadn't put those two layers of sandbags at the top of the lobby ramp, the whole first floor would've flooded!"

Because the electricity was still completely out on Greenway Court, Dad locked Apartment A6 back up, helped secure our SwiftChairs back inside the minivan, and drove us home to Arvin Road.

First thing Monday morning, September 22—with Dad's yellow legal pad tucked under his arm—the three of us rolled into Dr. Evelyn Carter's family medicine office in Virginia Beach. The moment Katie and I told Dr. Carter how our powerchair batteries had died on Friday afternoon and left us crawling on the carpet and unable even to ride over to check our apartment on Saturday until the street power came back on, Dr. Carter didn't hesitate for a second. Right there in the exam room, she wrote out the medical-necessity prescription and seating-clinic referral for two lightweight, collapsible cross-brace manual wheelchairs outfitted with right-armrest joystick power-drive attachments and removable under-seat battery boxes—giving us joystick driving that wouldn't strain our arms, folding frames that could fit in any car trunk, and manual freewheel push-handles so a dead battery would never trap us on a floor again.

We spent Tuesday and Wednesday at Dad's house on Arvin Road catching up on our CCHR computer science readings now that classes were preparing to resume, and on Wednesday afternoon, September 24—figuring six days had surely been long enough for Norfolk crews to re-energize West Ghent—we rode with Dad to the neighborhood supermarket on Indian River Road to go grocery shopping, picking out fresh milk, orange juice, eggs, bread, sliced honey ham, and cheddar cheese to restock our dorm fridge in Apartment A6.

From the grocery store parking lot, Dad drove us straight across the river to Greenway Court with our insulated bags of cold groceries in the back of the minivan.

When we turned down Redgate Avenue toward Greenway Court, our hopes soared: right across the way, the multi-story complex of Tidewater General Hospital—the region's only Level 1 Trauma Center—was lit up from top to bottom with full electrical power.

"Look, Nate—Tidewater General has all its lights on!" Katie smiled, squeezing my hand across our wheelchair armrests as Dad helped guide our two SwiftChairs up the front walkway and over the lobby ramp into our Greenway Court building. "Our power has got to be back on by now!"

Yet the moment we unlocked Apartment A6 and I reached up from my wheelchair to flip the wall switch, nothing happened.

Six full days after Hurricane Isabel had passed, the power failure on Greenway Court was still in progress.

Out in the front lobby, where Dave was wiping down the metal mailboxes, we found out why.

“We thought for sure the lights would be back on by today, Dave, especially with Tidewater General lit up right across the way,” Dad said, resting his hands on our rear push-handles.

“Tidewater General is the Level 1 Trauma Center, so it’s on a dedicated hospital priority feed,” Dave sighed, shaking his head in frustration. “Meanwhile, we’re still sitting here in the dark. I can’t confirm it officially with the engineers at Commonwealth Power, David, but the line crews out on Hampton Boulevard told us our building’s power grid is physically attached to the Midtown Tunnel circuit. When forty-four million gallons of Elizabeth River water flooded the Midtown Tunnel on Thursday, it shorted out the whole feeder—and they told us it’s going to take crews two full weeks to figure out how to cut the grid so that we’re separated from the Midtown Tunnel before our power comes back on.”

Standing in the dim first-floor hallway behind our wheelchairs, Dad looked from the dark doorway of Apartment A6 to Katie and me—realizing at once why Dad’s house on Arvin Road had gotten its electricity back in forty-eight hours while our Greenway Court building was still sitting unprioritized at the bottom of a tangled tunnel circuit.

“When we switched the Apartment A6 electric bill into your names in July,” Dad said, pulling his cell phone and his pocket notebook from his jacket, “the Medical Priority flag stayed attached only to my meter on Arvin Road. Commonwealth Power doesn’t have a Medical Priority flag on file for Apartment A6—so their outage system doesn’t even know there are two full-time electric wheelchair users living in this building.”

Right there that afternoon—before we loaded our bags of groceries back into the minivan and returned to Dad’s house on Arvin Road for another week—Dad called Dr. Carter’s office and Commonwealth Power’s Critical Care desk, helping Katie and me set up an official Medical Priority flag on our electric account for Apartment A6 on Greenway Court so that our Norfolk apartment would never be left behind in an extended power outage again.

And true to what the line crews had told Dave, our Greenway Court building stayed completely without electricity for two full weeks—until Commonwealth Power finally figured out how to cut and isolate our neighborhood grid from the flooded Midtown Tunnel on Thursday, October 2, 2003, allowing Katie and me to finally roll back into our dry, brightly lit studio sanctuary across the hall from Michael.

Wednesday, November 12, 2003, 5:30 PM — Our Backup Joystick-Outfitted Manual Chairs, Dad's Microwave Cart, & A Happy Year in Our Studio Sanctuary

By November and winter of our eighteenth year—with the hurricane debris cleared from West Ghent, our studio humming with warm electricity again, and our two brand-new backup collapsible manual wheelchairs fitted with right-armrest joystick attachments delivered through Dr. Carter's seating clinic and kept safely charged in reserve at Dad's house on Arvin Road—life inside Apartment A6 on Greenway Court settled into the happiest, most peaceful routine Katie and I had ever known.

Every morning, after waking up well-rested inside our shared sleeping bag on the carpeted floor of our square closet bedroom—while the full-sized bed out in the main studio stayed smooth and untouched—we used the padded transfer bench in our accessible shower, brushed our teeth side by side at the roll-under bathroom sink, and rolled out to our compact kitchenette. While I popped four slices of whole-wheat bread into the toaster on Dad's rolling utility cart and pulled the milk carton and butter out of the under-the-counter dorm fridge, Katie scrambled eggs on the four-burner stove, and we washed our plates and skillet in the sink the minute we finished eating.

Whenever we headed out our door and down Dave's nonslip aluminum ramp through the locked front lobby, we waved to Michael Ragsdale and his one-eyed black Lab Archie across the hall in Apartment A5 before rolling down Greenway Court and Redgate Avenue to Hampton Boulevard to catch the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Route 2 bus into Downtown Norfolk. Side by side in the front wheelchair bays of the bus, we rode ten minutes downtown to the Martin Building at the Community College of Hampton Roads Norfolk campus for our morning lectures, grabbed hot burgers and fries upstairs at the third-floor food court of The Admiral Center on Fridays, and rode the afternoon Route 2 bus right back home to West Ghent.

In the evenings, while the radiators and the through-wall fan kept our rectangular studio cozy and warm, Katie and I parked our SwiftChairs side by side at our long workstation desk in front of our shared desktop computer. Taking turns at the keyboard while the other sister or brother read aloud from our textbooks or debugged lines of HTML and Quantum Basic code on the seventeen-inch CRT monitor, we had everything we needed under one roof: four locked walls, a full kitchen cart, our own bus passes, and each other.

The Admiral Center Bookstore & Meeting Tiffany

Part 1: Death by Cascading Style Sheets & Iced Cocoa at Chapters & Co.

Date: 2004-05-14 at 15:15 America/New_York

Friday, May 14, 2004, 3:15 PM — The Computer Books Aisle at Chapters & Co.

“Two tall iced cocoas with extra whipped cream, coming right up—go pick out the web-design book you want for the summer, Nate, and I’ll meet you in the computer aisle!” Katie called out cheerfully over her shoulder, steering her compact SwiftChair power wheelchair up to the lowered marble counter of the café inside Chapters & Co. on the ground floor of The Admiral Center.

“Deal!” I grinned, turning my matching power wheelchair down the wide carpeted bookstore corridor toward the Computer & Internet shelves.

Katie and I had just turned nineteen a month earlier on April eighth, and twenty minutes ago we had walked—or rather, rolled—out of our final spring-semester exam across the street at the Downtown Norfolk campus of the Community College of Hampton Roads. Nearly a full year had passed since Dad had rented Apartment A6 on Greenway Court for the two of us, and life in our West Ghent studio had settled into the happiest, most comfortable rhythm we had ever known. Every weekday morning, Katie and I rode the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Route 2 bus down Hampton Boulevard to our college classes; every afternoon, we rolled home to our locked red-brick building, waved to Michael in Apartment A5 across the hall whenever we crossed paths by the lobby mailboxes, made honey-ham sandwiches beside Dad’s rolling microwave cart, and spent our evenings side by side at our shared desktop computer writing HTML websites.

Braking my wheelchair between the towering oak bookshelves of the programming section, I scanned the rows of thick technical manuals until my eyes landed on a fat, eight-hundred-page paperback near the upper-middle shelf titled Cascading Style Sheets & Dynamic Web Design.

It sat just an inch higher than my normal seated reach. Checking to make sure my wheels were locked, I braced my left hand on my armrest pad and stretched my right arm up from my seat cushion, hooking my index finger over the top edge of the spine to slide the heavy book out.

As I tilted the paperback forward, a second copy that had been wedged crookedly beside it slipped loose from the shelf and tipped straight toward my lap.

Before I could pull my hand back to catch both volumes at once, someone stepped smoothly into the aisle beside my right wheel and caught the falling book cleanly in midair with both hands.

“Whoa—careful! Death by cascading style sheets is a terrible way to start the weekend,” a warm, playful voice laughed right beside me.

I blinked and looked up. Standing next to my wheelchair was a girl who looked to be about twenty, with a heavier build, shoulder-length dark reddish-brown hair cut with neat bangs across her forehead, and black-rimmed rectangular glasses framing a bright, friendly smile. Tucking the rescued copy back onto the shelf with one hand, she held out the copy I had been reaching for with the other.

“Here you go,” she said warmly, handing the heavy paperback right into my hands at chest height without a trace of awkwardness. “I saw that second one teetering on the edge from the end of the aisle.”

“Thank you,” I said, feeling my ears warm slightly as my social scripts scrambled to catch up. Since Heather Collins had dumped me in the hallway of Northwood High School back in January of our senior year over my cousin Brittany’s New Year’s Eve party rumor, I hadn’t spoken to a girl my age outside of college group projects. “I didn’t realize the two copies were stuck together.”

“Those thick computer books are practically bricks,” an older woman with a kind, maternal smile agreed as she stepped up behind the girl, carrying a bookstore shopping bag over her forearm.

“Oh, I’m Tiffany, by the way—Tiffany Sloan,” the girl said, adjusting her black-rimmed glasses with a small, endearing laugh before extending her hand to shake mine. “And this is my mom, Sandra.”

“I’m Nathaniel—Nate Prairie,” I said, shaking Tiffany’s hand and nodding politely to her mother.

Instead of turning away the way most strangers did after a polite aisle interaction, Tiffany glanced down at the cover of Cascading Style Sheets & Dynamic Web Design resting across my lap, and her eyes lit up behind her glasses.

“Wait—do you actually know how to build websites?” Tiffany asked, sounding genuinely impressed. “Like, writing the real code from scratch?”

Speaking about HTML and CSS was the one topic on earth that bypassed every ounce of my shyness.

“Yeah, my twin sister and I have been hand-coding HTML since we were in seventh grade at Morrison Middle School,” I said, my posture brightening immediately. “We’ve been using HTML tables for page layouts, and we’re switching everything over to CSS positioning this summer now that spring finals at CCHR are done.”

“No way!” Tiffany beamed. “I’ve been trying to put together a simple little webpage on my computer at home for weeks, and every time I try to line up a picture next to a paragraph, the whole page jumps to the bottom of the screen! I came over to this aisle looking for a beginner book, and half of them look like they’re written in ancient Greek.”

“That’s usually just an unclosed table cell tag or an image alignment attribute,” I explained eagerly, opening the paperback on my lap to a diagram of floating div containers. “Once you see how container boxes work, it’s super logical.”

At that exact moment, the quiet hum of electric wheelchair motors rounded the corner of the bookshelf, and Katie rolled into the aisle balancing a cardboard four-cup carrier on her lap with two tall plastic cups of iced cocoa topped with swirled domes of whipped cream.

“Got our celebratory cocoas, Nate—zero coffee, extra chocolate drizzle!” Katie announced happily before spotting Tiffany and Sandra standing beside my chair. “Oh! Hi!”

Out of pure lifelong habit, I braced myself for the micro-expression we saw from ninety percent of the public whenever they realized there were two of us in identical compact power wheelchairs.

Tiffany didn't blink, stare, or take a step back. Instead, her face broke into an even wider, delighted smile.

"Katie, this is Tiffany Sloan and her mom, Sandra," I introduced them proudly. "Tiffany just saved me from getting clobbered by a falling eight-hundred-page CSS manual. Tiffany, Sandra—this is my twin sister, Katie."

"Hi, Katie! It is so nice to meet you!" Tiffany said, shaking Katie's free hand with warm enthusiasm. "Nate was literally just telling me that the two of you have been coding websites together since seventh grade and just finished your freshman finals at CCHR!"

"Last exam turned in twenty minutes ago," Katie grinned, immediately warming to Tiffany's friendly, unhurried energy. "And knowing my brother, he was already explaining unclosed HTML tags before he even said hello."

Tiffany laughed out loud, looking between the two of us with genuine admiration. "Are you kidding? I think it's amazing! Wait—do you two take all your classes together too?"

"Every single one," Katie said proudly, glancing over at me. "And we share a studio apartment over in West Ghent on Greenway Court."

"Are you serious?! That is so cool!" Tiffany said, placing a hand over her heart. "My younger brother and I are super close too. Honestly, I always say family comes first, no matter what. When a brother and sister look out for each other the way you two do, that shows what kind of heart a person has. If a guy isn't close with his sister, that's a giant red flag in my book!"

Beside me, I saw Katie's shoulders relax completely, a bright, unmistakable smile of approval lighting up her blue eyes. To both of us, hearing someone say out loud that a close brother-and-sister bond was something wonderful—rather than something strange—felt like passing the most important test in the world.

Friday, May 14, 2004, 3:35 PM — Café Chairs, A Sudden May Cloudburst, & The Umbrella over Our Joysticks

"Well, if you two aren't in a rush to catch your bus right this second, why don't we sit down in the café for a few minutes while you drink your iced cocoas?" Sandra suggested warmly, gesturing toward the open tables near the front windows of Chapters & Co. "Tiffany and I were just about to grab a lemonade."

"We'd love that," Katie said at once, looking at me for confirmation.

"Definitely," I nodded.

We rolled back out of the computer aisle to the checkout counter so I could pay for the CSS paperback, and then headed over to a round four-top table in the bookstore café. Before Katie or I even had to ask, Tiffany stepped ahead of our wheelchairs, lifted two of the heavy wooden café chairs away from the table, and tucked them neatly against the wall so Katie and I could roll right up to the table edge side by side with plenty of elbow room.

Katie caught my eye across our armrests and gave me a subtle, approving nod. Almost nobody thought to clear two chairs from a restaurant table without making a big show out of it.

For the next forty minutes, while Tiffany and her mother sipped iced lemonades and Katie and I drank our iced cocoas, the conversation flowed without a single awkward pause. Tiffany asked Katie what her favorite classes at CCHR had been, laughed at our story about how our dad had assembled a rolling microwave-and-toaster cart in our Greenway Court kitchenette because our studio only had an under-the-counter dorm fridge, and listened with rapt attention as Katie and I took turns explaining how we formatted our shared computer desktop.

When I glanced at my watch at four-fifteen, I saw that the afternoon sky outside The Admiral Center's glass rotunda had turned the dark slate-gray of a sudden May coastal thunderstorm.

"We should probably head up to Monticello and Charlotte so we catch the four-thirty Route 2 bus back to West Ghent before the sky opens up," Katie said, tucking her empty cocoa cup into the trash bin beside the café exit.

"Which way is your stop?" Tiffany asked as the four of us headed out through the mall's sliding glass doors onto the downtown sidewalk.

"Just one block north up Monticello Avenue," I said.

Right as our front caster wheels cleared the mall awning, the first fat drops of warm May rain began pattering against the concrete. We couldn't load our heavy motorized SwiftChairs into a standard family minivan without a hydraulic lift, which meant the Route 2 bus was our only way home—and the one part of a power wheelchair that hated getting rained on was the electronic joystick controller mounted on the right armrest.

"Oh, don't let the rain get on your controls!" Sandra said immediately, popping open a wide, oversized navy-blue golf umbrella from her tote bag while Tiffany pulled a second compact umbrella out of her purse.

Without hesitation, Tiffany stepped right alongside my right armrest and angled her open umbrella directly over my head and my right-hand joystick controller, while Sandra walked beside Katie's wheelchair holding the big golf umbrella over Katie's head and joystick.

Walking shoulder-to-wheel with us down the block to the covered glass bus shelter at Monticello and Charlotte, Tiffany kept her umbrella steady over my armrest until both of our wheelchairs were safely parked underneath the dry acrylic roof of the transit shelter.

"Thank you so much, both of you," Katie said warmly, wiping a single raindrop off her sleeve. "Most people just sprint for their car when it starts raining."

"What are friends for?" Tiffany smiled, shaking out her umbrella and tucking a lock of dark reddish-brown hair behind her ear as she looked down at me through her black-rimmed glasses. Reaching into her purse, she pulled out a ballpoint pen and a cardstock bookmark from Chapters & Co., scribbled her name and phone number across the back in neat handwriting, and handed it to me.

“Here’s my number, Nate,” Tiffany said softly, her cheeks turning a pretty pink. “If you and Katie aren’t busy tomorrow afternoon, maybe my mom could drop me off over at your building in West Ghent? I could bring over a big cheese pizza from Gianni’s for the three of us, and you two could show me how to fix my webpage!”

My heart did a sudden, weightless flip in my chest as I looked from the bookmark in my hand to Katie.

“Saturday pizza and HTML debugging sounds awesome to us,” Katie beamed, answering for both of us without missing a beat. “Just call Nate’s cell when you pull into the Greenway Court lot tomorrow so we can come down to the lobby and unlock the front door for you.”

Down the block, the amber destination sign of our CVTA Route 2 bus rounded the corner onto Monticello Avenue, its air brakes hissing as it pulled flush to the curb and kneeled.

“There’s our bus,” I said, slipping Tiffany’s bookmark carefully into my shirt pocket right over my heart before pulling out my flip phone so we could trade numbers.

As the bus driver deployed the front hydraulic wheelchair ramp onto the sidewalk and Katie rolled aboard first to turn into the rear securement bay, Tiffany leaned down beside my wheelchair. Wrapping both arms around my shoulders, she pulled me into a warm, remarkably firm hug—pressing her cheek against mine with a steady, comforting weight that made my whole chest glow.

“I’m really glad that book almost fell on you today, Nate,” Tiffany whispered against my ear before straightening up and waving to Katie through the open bus doors. “It was so great meeting both of you! I’ll call you tomorrow morning!”

“See you tomorrow, Tiffany! Bye, Sandra!” Katie called out from the wheelchair bay with a huge wave as I rolled up the hydraulic ramp right behind my twin sister.

As the Route 2 bus pulled away from the curb and headed toward West Ghent through the May sun-shower, Katie reached across the aisle between our two secured wheelchairs, squeezed my hand, and grinned from ear to ear.

“Did you see how she cleared those café chairs and held her umbrella right over your joystick, Nate?” Katie said, her eyes shining with genuine happiness for me. “And she wants to bring pizza over for the three of us tomorrow! I think she really, really likes you.”

Part 2: Saturday Pizza in Apartment A6 & Katie’s Wholehearted Blessing

Date: 2004-05-15 at 13:00 America/New_York

Saturday, May 15, 2004, 1:00 PM — Pizza, Floppy Disks, & HTML in Apartment A6

“She’s pulling into the parking lot right now!” I said at one o’clock on Saturday afternoon, peeking through the white mini-blinds after my flip phone rang with a single bar of signal by our window.

“Come on—let’s roll out to the front lobby together to let her in,” Katie smiled, smoothing down the hem of her royal-blue sweater as she checked our studio one last time.

We had spent the morning tidying every corner of Apartment A6 until our rectangular studio gleamed. Our full-sized bed was neatly made against the side wall, the speckled laminate counter above our under-the-counter dorm fridge was wiped spotless beside Dad’s rolling microwave-and-toaster cart, and our shared desktop computer was booted up at our long workstation desk.

Rolling down the first-floor hallway and down Dave’s nonslip aluminum ramp over the three rubber-treaded lobby steps, I unlocked the building’s 24/7 keyed glass-and-aluminum front door right as Tiffany stepped up the front walkway past the circular brick lamppost planter, carrying a steaming cardboard pizza box in both hands while her mother Sandra waved warmly to us from the driver’s window of their minivan in the parking lot.

“Hey, you two!” Tiffany beamed, stepping into the cool lobby as Sandra pulled out of the lot to run afternoon errands. “One large extra-cheese pizza and a two-liter bottle of ginger ale—Nate told me yesterday at the bookstore that the two of you don’t drink alcohol or like the taste of coffee, and that ginger ale is one of your favorite sodas with pizza, so I made sure to grab a cold bottle!”

Katie and I exchanged an instant, delighted look. Remembering a detail like our ginger-ale rule from a single conversation the day before meant everything to us.

“You remembered!” Katie said warmly as we led Tiffany up the short aluminum ramp and down the first-floor corridor to the back of the building. “Right this way—we’re in A6, right across the hall from our old neighborhood friend Michael in A5.”

When I unlocked our wooden door and held it open for Tiffany to step inside Apartment A6, she paused in the center of the carpet and looked around our studio with an appreciative smile.

“Look how nice and neat you two keep this place!” Tiffany said, setting the warm pizza box down on our kitchenette counter next to Dad’s rolling microwave cart. “Seriously, Katie, you can tell a girl who cares about organization lives here—there isn’t a single dish in the sink, and look at that microwave cart your dad put together!”

“Wait until you see the walk-in closet and the roll-under bathroom sink,” Katie said proudly, grabbing three paper plates and three plastic cups from the cabinet above our stove before pouring cold ginger ale for all three of us.

After we ate two slices of warm cheese pizza apiece, Katie washed our three plastic cups in the kitchenette sink right away—following our house rule of washing dishes as we go—and Tiffany pulled a blue three-and-a-half-inch floppy disk out of her purse.

“Okay, Professor Nate and Professor Katie,” Tiffany laughed, holding up the floppy disk as she walked over to our long computer workstation desk. “Don’t laugh at my messy code, okay? I brought my HTML file on disk so you two could show me what I did wrong.”

Because our studio didn't have extra desk chairs—since Katie and I always sat side by side at the workstation in our compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs—Tiffany didn't ask to sit on our bed across the room. Instead, she kneeled right down on the soft carpet between our two wheelchairs so her black-rimmed glasses were at the exact same eye level as ours while I slid her blue floppy disk into the A: drive of our desktop tower.

Opening her index.html file in a plain-text editor on our seventeen-inch CRT monitor, Katie and I spotted the bug on line forty-two at the exact same second.

"There it is," Katie pointed at the screen with a friendly grin. "You opened a second table row right here without closing the first table cell."

"And look what happens when we replace that nested table with two simple CSS float blocks from the book you caught for me yesterday," I said, typing out a clean ten-line stylesheet block and hitting refresh in the browser window.

On the monitor, Tiffany's jumbled pictures and text snapped into a clean, centered two-column page layout.

"No way! You two fixed that in thirty seconds!" Tiffany gasped, clapping her hands together before turning on the carpet and wrapping one arm around my shoulders and the other arm around Katie's shoulders in a spontaneous three-way group hug. "You guys are absolute geniuses! I wish I had half the brains the two of you have."

For the rest of the afternoon, the three of us stayed right there in Apartment A6 like we had known each other for years. Tiffany listened attentively as I walked her through every CSS property in the new manual, asked Katie about the fall course schedule at the Community College of Hampton Roads, and laughed whenever Katie and I finished each other's sentences. Not once did Tiffany act impatient, not once did she try to pull me away from my twin sister, and when Sandra called at five o'clock from the parking lot out front to pick her up, Tiffany helped Katie fold up the empty pizza box before giving both Katie and me a warm goodbye hug in the hallway.

Saturday, May 15, 2004, 5:20 PM — "You Deserve Someone Who Makes You Happy, Nate"

When we rolled back up the lobby ramp after watching Sandra's minivan turn off Greenway Court and locked the deadbolt of Apartment A6 behind us, I parked my wheelchair beside our computer desk, still feeling the warm glow of Tiffany's hug in my chest.

Across the room by the kitchenette, Katie pivoted her SwiftChair around, rolled right up beside me, and took my left hand in hers.

"Well?" I asked quietly, looking into my twin sister's blue eyes—because in nineteen years of life, I had never made a single major decision without knowing what Katie thought first. "What did you think of her, Katie?"

Katie's face softened into the warmest, most genuine smile I had ever seen.

“I really like her, Nate,” Katie said wholeheartedly, giving my hand a reassuring squeeze. “She brought ginger ale just for us, she sat right down on the carpet between our chairs so we were all together at the computer, and she didn’t act weird for a single second about how close you and I are. After how unfair Heather was to you in high school over a rumor that wasn’t even true, you deserve someone sweet and patient who makes you happy.”

A huge wave of relief and excitement washed through my chest. Having a girl like Tiffany smile at me and hold my hand felt wonderful—but having my twin sister’s complete, enthusiastic blessing made the whole world feel safe.

“She asked if we wanted to hang out with her again next weekend,” I said, smiling back at Katie.

“Then you should call her tonight and tell her yes,” Katie beamed, resting her head briefly against my shoulder the way we always did when everything in our world was right. “Everything is going to be great, Nate.”

Part 3: Tiffany’s Pitch for Our Own Place in Ocean View & The Promise of Brother-and-Sister Weekends

Date: 2004-08-14 at 14:30 America/New_York

Saturday, August 14, 2004, 2:30 PM — “Just One Route 1 Bus Ride Up Granby Street”

“Look at the floor plan in this rental brochure my mom picked up for us yesterday, Nate,” nineteen-year-old Tiffany Sloan said warmly on a sunny Saturday afternoon in mid-August, spreading a folded one-page apartment flyer across the corner of our computer workstation desk inside Apartment A6 on Greenway Court while handing Katie and me two cold cans of orange soda from our dorm fridge. “It’s a ground-floor one-bedroom apartment right by the beach at a quiet courtyard complex called Sea Breeze West on West Ocean View Avenue.”

Sitting side by side in our compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs at the workstation desk, Katie and I looked down at the printed flyer together.

Three months had passed since that Friday afternoon in May when Tiffany had caught the falling CSS manual for me at Chapters & Co. inside The Admiral Center, and through the entire summer of 2004, Tiffany had been everything a nineteen-year-old guy who had never had a real girlfriend could have hoped for. Every weekend she had come over to Apartment A6 to watch movies, eat pizza with cold ginger ale or fruit juice, and sit between our wheelchairs while I worked on HTML templates. Whenever our dad David had driven down from Northern Virginia to take us out to dinner, Tiffany had been polite and respectful, and she had never once complained about how close Katie and I were.

Now, with the fall semester at the Community College of Hampton Roads approaching at the end of August, Tiffany rested her hand affectionately on my shoulder and looked from my face to Katie’s with a gentle, understanding smile behind her black-rimmed glasses.

“I love coming over here to visit you two in West Ghent,” Tiffany said softly, “and I know how special this studio has been for the two of you since you turned eighteen. But let’s be honest—Apartment A6 is a single-room studio with one full-sized bed and no bedroom walls. Now that Nate and I have been dating all summer and getting serious, it’s really hard for a boyfriend and girlfriend to have any normal couple privacy in a studio apartment with three people in one room, and my mom keeps hounding me at home about when I’m going to get my own apartment.”

I looked across my armrest at Katie. For nineteen years—from our cribs in Virginia Beach to the house on Delaney Street, through the Friday afternoon at Northwood High School when our legs gave out within three hours of each other, and through every night since April eighth zipped inside our shared sleeping bag on the carpeted floor of the square walk-in closet four feet behind us—Katie and I had never once lived under separate roofs.

Seeing the hesitation tighten around my eyes and Katie’s, Tiffany immediately knelt down on the carpet between our two wheelchairs, just like she had done on her very first Saturday afternoon in Apartment A6, and took one of Katie’s hands and one of mine.

“Hey—look at me, both of you,” Tiffany said in her sweetest, most reassuring voice. “Nobody is talking about separating the two of you or breaking up your routine. Do you know why my mom and I picked Sea Breeze West on West Ocean View Avenue instead of looking over in Portsmouth or Chesapeake? Look at the bus stop right down at the corner of West Ocean View Avenue and Duffy’s Lane.”

Tiffany tapped her fingernail against the hand-drawn map at the bottom of the rental flyer.

“It’s right on CVTA Route 1 and Route 3,” Tiffany beamed. “That’s a single, direct one-seat bus ride straight down Granby Street and Princess Anne Road to right here in West Ghent! No transfers, no bridges, and no tunnels—just thirty-five minutes on the bus. Katie gets to have all of Apartment A6 to herself without two other people crowding her kitchenette and bathroom, Nate and I get a real one-bedroom apartment with a big green living-room sofa right by the front windows, and you two still take your classes together at CCHR during the week.”

“What about weekends?” Katie asked quietly, looking straight into Tiffany’s eyes behind her glasses. “Nate and I have spent every weekend together our whole lives.”

“And you’re still going to!” Tiffany promised without a second’s hesitation, squeezing Katie’s fingers warmly. “That’s the best part of having a real living room with a big three-cushion green sofa at Sea Breeze West! Whenever you two want a Brother-and-Sister Weekend—just the two of you hanging out, coding on Nate’s computer, and eating pizza all weekend long—Katie can hop right on the Route 1 bus on Friday or Saturday, roll straight into Apartment 3, and sleep right on the green sofa! You two won’t miss a single beat.”

Across our armrests, Katie looked at me.

I could see that my twin sister was going to miss having me right beside her every night in Apartment A6 just as much as I was going to miss her. Yet because Tiffany was smiling so warmly, holding both of our hands on the carpet, and promising up and down that West Ocean View was only one Route 1 bus ride away and that our Brother-and-Sister Weekends would always be sacred, Katie didn't want to stand in the way of me having my first real adult relationship.

"Thirty-five minutes on Route 1 really isn't far at all, Nate," Katie said bravely, offering me the same supportive smile she had given me back in May. "And since Dad already paid the lease here on Apartment A6 through next spring while your disability check and Tiffany's job cover the rent up at Sea Breeze West, we'll see each other at CCHR during the week and have our Brother-and-Sister Weekends in Ocean View."

"Are you sure you'll be okay here in A6 by yourself at night, Katie?" I asked, my throat tightening slightly as I glanced toward our square walk-in closet. "Michael and Ashley are right across the hall in A5 if you ever need anything, and you can call my flip phone anytime day or night."

"I'll be fine, Nate," Katie said, leaning across our armrests to hug me tight. "You found a girlfriend who understands how close we are and already planned out the bus route so we can spend weekends together. Go sign the lease—and next month in September, as soon as you two get your boxes unpacked, I'm riding the Route 1 bus up to Ocean View Station for our very first Brother-and-Sister Weekend."

"It's a date!" Tiffany chirped, hugging both of us around the shoulders. "Wait until you see the green sofa, Katie—you're going to love it!"

Two weeks later, at the end of August 2004, Dad drove down from Northern Virginia with his SUV to help load my desktop tower PC, my seventeen-inch CRT monitor, and my clothes up to Apartment 3 on the ground floor of the white-painted courtyard building at Sea Breeze West on West Ocean View Avenue, while setting up a second desktop computer for Katie at the workstation desk in Apartment A6 so we could message each other every evening.

When Dad and I rolled out the keyed glass front door of the Greenway Court building that afternoon, Katie smiled and waved to me from the lobby window in her compact SwiftChair, holding up two crossed fingers—our lifelong twin signal for see you soon—as we counted down the days until our first Brother-and-Sister Weekend in September.

West Ocean View & Reclaiming Our Sanctuary

Ocean View Station, Dirty Old Tonomy Hill, & Five Buses from Williamsburg

Part 1: Ocean View Station, The Green Sofa Confrontation, & Speak Now or Forever Hold Your Peace

Date: 2004-09-18 at 19:30 America/New_York

Saturday, September 18, 2004, 7:30 PM — Ocean View Station & The Green Sofa Confrontation at Sea Breeze West

“This is going to be a great weekend,” I said, rolling my compact SwiftChair power wheelchair right up to the curb cut at Ocean View Station as the hydraulic front ramp of the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Route 1 bus folded down onto the concrete and my nineteen-year-old twin sister Katie wheeled off the bus straight into my arms.

Wearing her favorite royal-blue long-sleeve V-neck sweater with black trim at the collar and cuffs and light-blue jeans, with an overnight backpack clipped to the rear frame of her matching SwiftChair, Katie threw both arms around my shoulders across our armrests and hugged me tight in the warm September evening air blowing off the Chesapeake Bay.

“I’ve missed you all week, Nate,” Katie said happily, resting her cheek against mine for a second before we released our brakes and rolled side by side down the sidewalk along West Ocean View Avenue. “Two whole days of just brother-and-sister time, coding on your computer, and no drama.”

“We’ve got the whole weekend,” I smiled, checking my watch on my left wrist as we turned past the low white two-rail fence into the small, tree-shaded courtyard of Sea Breeze West.

Our complex consisted of two low-rise early-nineteen-seventies buildings facing each other across the narrow courtyard and asphalt parking lot—the red-brick building with the script Sea Breeze West sign and the quarter-operated laundry room on one side, and our white-painted two-story courtyard building on the other, where the exterior unit doors and wide double windows were lined up side by side like an old coastal motel. My unit—Apartment 3—sat on the ground floor at the very far end of the white-painted building, furthest from the parking lot.

When I unlocked the wooden front door in the right-hand corner and rolled inside ahead of Katie, the single six-hundred-square-foot apartment opened straight into our combination living room and kitchen. Immediately to the left of the front door, directly beneath the two wide front windows covered by white horizontal mini-blinds looking out onto the courtyard, sat our bright green three-cushion sofa with an oval weathered-wood coffee table in front of it and a black cathode-ray-tube television on a two-shelf black-and-glass stand in the opposite front corner. Just beyond the oval coffee table stood a large dining table that I used as a computer desk for my desktop tower PC running Quantum OS XN Pro, looking straight ahead into the open kitchen with its olive-green base cabinets, speckled laminate prep counters, slate-blue four-burner electric stove, sink, and full-size top-freezer refrigerator.

Standing near the corner television stand in a mint-green short-sleeve graphic T-shirt, charcoal-gray pants, and black-rimmed rectangular glasses, my nineteen-year-old girlfriend Tiffany Sloan froze and stared at Katie’s wheelchair rolling through the doorway behind me.

“Wait, what?” Tiffany snarled, her voice dropping into a harsh, hostile edge behind her glasses.

I blinked, braking my chair beside the bright green sofa while Katie transferred smoothly from her SwiftChair onto the left cushion of the couch and patted the middle cushion for me to sit beside her.

“I thought we discussed this on Thursday, Tiffany,” I said, transferring onto the green sofa next to Katie as my twin sister naturally draped her right arm around my shoulders the way we had sat together our entire lives. “My sister wants to see me for the weekend.”

Tiffany shot me a venomous dirty look, her face flushing dark red behind her black-rimmed glasses as she stared at Katie’s arm around my brick-red polo shirt. It baffled me why Tiffany always acted so bitterly jealous whenever another woman—even my own fraternal twin sister—hugged me, especially when I had never once had a problem with Tiffany being close with her own brother.

“Katie is going to sleep right here on the green sofa, just like we discussed,” I added, trying to keep my voice calm and even so an argument wouldn’t start before Katie even unclipped her overnight bag.

Across the oval wooden coffee table, I could feel Katie’s shoulders tense as she watched Tiffany and me fighting yet again.

“I wanted some time with my brother, Tiffany,” Katie said firmly, looking straight across the living room at her. “You get to see him twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. I don’t.”

“I am his girlfriend!” Tiffany snapped at the top of her lungs.

Katie’s blue eyes flashed with instant, protective fire.

“Don’t yell at me like that,” Katie retorted, transferring straight off the green sofa back into her SwiftChair in one fluid motion. Reaching across her armrest, she took me firmly by the hand and snarled, “Come on, Nate.”

Turning her head toward Tiffany by the corner television stand, Katie growled three words that echoed off the drywall from the front window blinds all the way back to the open kitchen stove:

“My brother only!”

Saturday, September 18, 2004, 7:55 PM — The Courtyard Walk & “Speak Now or Forever Hold Your Peace”

I wasn’t sure how to react—my head was spinning in complete confusion as I transferred back into my own SwiftChair and rolled out the front door of Apartment 3 right behind Katie into the cool September twilight of the Sea Breeze West courtyard.

The moment the wooden door clicked shut behind us and we rolled past the white two-rail fence toward the quiet sidewalk along West Ocean View Avenue, Katie braked her wheelchair, pivoted to face me under the streetlamp, and got straight to the point.

“Why do you stay with her, Nate?” Katie demanded.

I gave her what must have been a bewildered, defensive look, my hands tightening on my armrest pads.

“I’m your twin!” Katie said, leaning forward in her chair so her blue eyes locked directly onto mine. “I know when something’s up before you even say a word. Now please, tell me the truth. Why do you stay with her?”

“Katie, I… uh… well, I finally found someone,” I stammered in frustration, my voice cracking as the familiar ache of nineteen years of awkwardness and rejection after Heather Collins at Northwood High School knotted my chest. “A real, actual girlfriend.”

“She’s hurting you,” Katie said, her voice dropping from anger to an aching, urgent plea. “Why can’t you see it?”

“You’re just mad that I found someone!” I snapped back before I could stop myself.

Katie didn’t flinch, though I saw the hurt flash across her face under the streetlamp.

“Listen to you!” Katie replied softly, shaking her head. “I’m your sister, Nate. You shouldn’t be snapping at me like that. Your own twin sister.”

The second those words left her mouth, the defensive wall inside my chest collapsed. Hot tears leaked from my eyes and spilled down my cheeks as I realized I was blowing up at Katie—the one person on earth who had never left my side through our parents’ divorce on Delaney Street, through the September Friday in eleventh grade when our legs gave out, and through every lonely bus ride across Hampton Roads.

“It’s alright,” Katie whispered immediately, rolling her SwiftChair two inches closer and reaching across to hold my hand in both of hers. “I’m not mad at you, Nate. Not ever. But I still don’t approve of her, and I never will.”

My sister gripped my hand more tightly, her fingers warm and steady around mine while my thoughts collided inside my skull. Katie had always been there for me, yet part of my stubborn nineteen-year-old brain kept clinging to the illusion that having a girlfriend meant I had finally built a normal adult life—even if that life meant walking on eggshells around Tiffany’s temper and Tiffany’s overbearing mother every single day.

Looking straight into my tear-streaked eyes, Katie spoke in a clear, solemn voice that sounded like a sworn oath in a courtroom.

“If she ever pops the question, Nate, I am telling you right now,” Katie said, squeezing my hand so hard I could feel the pulse in her fingers. “When the minister or the judge stands up in front of the room and says, Speak now or forever hold your peace, I will be speaking up. I will roll my wheelchair right down the center aisle, I will look the officiant in the eye on the record, and I will tell the whole room that my autistic twin brother is being coerced, isolated from his family, and pressured into a marriage against his will so they have to stop the ceremony on the spot. It is my duty as your twin sister to protect you—and no, I never thought it would come down to this.”

It was too much for my brain to comprehend all at once. Between Tiffany screaming at us inside Apartment 3, the humiliating memory of Tiffany's mother glaring at me, and Katie swearing on the West Ocean View sidewalk that she would literally halt a wedding ceremony under Virginia law to rescue me, my autistic sensory circuits hit total overload. I felt like my head was about to explode, and all I wanted to do was crawl into a dark, quiet closet away from the rest of the world.

Katie saw my shoulders trembling and read my silence before I could even form a sentence.

"You can't think straight right now," Katie whispered gently, stroking the back of my hand with her thumb. "You know I can read your mind. Please be honest with me."

She paused for a long breath, letting the distant rumble of a Route 1 bus rolling down West Ocean View Avenue pass behind us before she plunged on.

"To tell you the truth, Nate, I do not approve of Tiffany," Katie said quietly. "I do not like her, and I will never like her. She will never earn my respect, and I really want you to leave her. You're not happy, and you need to get rid of her. Whenever you're ready to see that—no matter how long it takes or how bad it gets—I'm right here."

Part 2: Riding Route 1 Back to West Ghent, Meeting Brandon Mercer at The Admiral Center, & Taking Things Slow

Date: 2004-09-19 at 13:15 America/New_York

Sunday, September 19, 2004, 1:15 PM — The Empty Half of Apartment A6 & Rolling Over to The Admiral Center

"I haven't slept that badly since the hospital in eleventh grade," I muttered to myself at one-fifteen on Sunday afternoon as the hydraulic ramp of the southbound CVTA Route 1 bus folded down onto the curb in West Ghent and I rolled my compact SwiftChair down the shaded brick sidewalk toward the two-story red-brick apartment building on Greenway Court.

My stomach had been tied in a sick, heavy knot ever since eight-fifteen the night before, when Katie had refused to step another foot inside Apartment 3 at Sea Breeze West after Tiffany's screaming outburst by the green sofa and had ridden the Saturday night Route 1 bus all the way back down Granby Street to Greenway Court by herself. All night long, lying awake on the sagging mattress in West Ocean View while Tiffany snored beside me, one sentence Katie had spoken under the courtyard streetlamp had echoed inside my skull:

I'm your sister, Nate. You shouldn't be snapping at me like that. Your own twin sister.

The moment Tiffany left at noon on Sunday to go spend the afternoon at her mother Sandra's house, I had rolled straight down to Ocean View Station and caught the twelve-thirty southbound Route 1 bus. I didn't care if Tiffany got annoyed when she found out I had gone to West Ghent; I couldn't go another hour without looking my twin sister in the eye, apologizing for snapping at her, and making sure she knew I loved her.

Because I still kept my brass Greenway Court keys on my keyring, I unlocked the building's 24/7 keyed glass-and-aluminum front door, rolled up Dave's nonslip aluminum ramp over the three lobby steps, and wheeled down the quiet first-floor hallway to Apartment A6 on the back right side of the building.

I knocked twice on the wooden door. "Katie? It's Nate."

When no one answered from inside, I used my spare key to unlock the deadbolt and pushed the door open.

Rolling three feet across the threshold into Apartment A6 stopped me cold.

For sixteen months, from the day after our eighteenth birthday until three weeks ago at the end of August, this rectangular studio had been ours. Now, looking around the spotless room in the quiet Sunday afternoon light filtering through the white mini-blinds above the through-wall air conditioner, the silence felt almost unbearable. The right half of our long computer workstation desk—where my desktop tower and seventeen-inch CRT monitor had sat right beside Katie's—was completely bare except for a neatly coiled ethernet cable. Across the room, the door to our square walk-in closet stood halfway open, and on the vacuumed carpet inside, our navy-blue sleeping bag was folded into a neat square with only a single pillow resting on top of it.

A lump rose in my throat as I realized Katie had come home from Ocean View in tears the night before and had slept in that closet completely alone.

Rolling over to her workstation desk, I spotted a yellow sticky note stuck to the bottom bezel of her monitor in Katie's neat handwriting:

12:45 PM — Rolled over to the bakery café at The Admiral Center for a cup of hot chocolate and fresh air. Back by 2:30! — Katie

I locked the door of Apartment A6 behind me, rolled back out the front entrance of the Greenway Court building, and set my SwiftChair speed dial to a brisk four miles per hour down the sidewalk toward Twenty-First Street.

Sunday, September 19, 2004, 1:40 PM — Brandon Mercer Presents Himself as a Gentleman, Defends Nate, & Respects Katie's Pace

Ten minutes later, I turned my wheelchair into the wide brick pedestrian promenade of The Admiral Center.

Three storefronts down from the glass windows of Chapters & Co., where I had met Tiffany back in May, was the outdoor brick patio of the corner bakery and café. Shaded by dark-green canvas umbrellas, the patio had four wide, wheelchair-accessible wrought-iron tables along the outer walkway.

And sitting at the corner table in her compact black SwiftChair, wearing her royal-blue sweater with both hands wrapped around a steaming paper cup of hot chocolate, was Katie.

She wasn't sitting alone.

Seated across the small round table from her in a wrought-iron patio chair was a clean-cut, soft-spoken young man who looked to be about twenty-two years old, wearing a neatly pressed light-blue button-down shirt, khaki trousers, and a leather wristwatch, with short sandy-brown hair and a warm, attentive expression on his face. On the table between them sat a fresh stack of paper napkins, an unopened bottle of strawberry-kiwi flavored water beside Katie's hot chocolate, and a tall glass of apple juice in front of him.

As I rolled down the brick walkway toward their table, Katie was laughing softly at something he had just said—the first real smile I had seen on my sister's face all weekend. Then she glanced up, saw my SwiftChair rolling toward her, and her blue eyes widened.

"Nate!" Katie said, setting her cup of hot chocolate down as I braked my chair right beside hers and reached across our armrests with both hands.

"Katie, I'm so sorry about last night," I blurted out immediately, my voice thick as I held her hands tightly in mine. "I couldn't stay up in Ocean View another minute without coming down here on Route 1 to tell you how sorry I am for snapping at you in the courtyard. You were right—you're my twin sister, and I never should have talked to you like that."

Katie's eyes softened instantly, and she leaned across our armrests to wrap both arms around my neck in a tight, forgiving hug.

"I told you last night I wasn't mad at you, Nate," Katie whispered against my collar before sitting back and wiping a tear from the corner of her eye with a smile. "I'm really glad you came down. I went back to A6 last night and the apartment felt so quiet this morning that I had to get out for a little while."

She turned toward the young man in the light-blue button-down shirt, who had politely stood up a few inches and stepped back just enough during our hug to give us a respectful moment of sibling privacy before offering me a warm, friendly smile.

"Nate, this is Brandon Mercer," Katie said, introducing us. "He's visiting Norfolk from Williamsburg today. About twenty minutes ago, some guy in a hurry with three shopping bags cut across the patio, bumped right into my table, and knocked my entire cup of hot chocolate all over the bricks without even stopping to say excuse me. Brandon came right over with a stack of napkins to clean up the table, went inside to buy me a brand-new cup of hot chocolate and a bottle of flavored water, and asked if he could keep me company."

Brandon leaned down slightly so he was at my eye level and extended his right hand across the table with a genuine, unhurried handshake.

"It's really good to meet you, Nate," Brandon said in a calm, pleasant voice. "Katie's been telling me all about you and the classes the two of you are taking at CCHR. You two have a lot to be proud of."

"Thank you for helping my sister out with the spilled hot chocolate, Brandon," I said, shaking his hand and immediately noticing how natural and unforced he was around our two power wheelchairs—not staring at the joysticks, not talking down to us in a high-pitched voice the way strangers sometimes did, and sitting right back down at our level. “And I’m sorry if I interrupted you two because I needed to apologize for ruining her weekend.”

“Hey, don’t beat yourself up, man,” Brandon said warmly, holding up a hand with an understanding smile as he looked from me to Katie. “Katie was just telling me a little bit about what happened up in Ocean View last night because I asked why she looked so down when I first walked over, and I already told her five minutes ago that I knew right away it wasn’t your fault.”

I blinked in surprise. “You did?”

“Of course it wasn’t your fault,” Brandon said earnestly, nodding toward both of us. “Anyone who listens to Katie talk about you for two minutes can tell how close the two of you have been your whole lives. When a good guy moves into his first apartment with a girlfriend and she suddenly changes the rules after the lease is signed—after promising your sister she’d be welcome for the weekend—it catches you completely off guard. You didn’t want your sister hurt; you just got put on the spot in a tiny living room and tried to keep the peace. And the fact that you rode the city bus all the way down from Ocean View today just to apologize and make sure Katie was okay proves what kind of brother you are.”

Across our armrests, Katie looked at me with a warm, relieved nod, and I felt the tight band around my chest loosen for the first time since Saturday night. After how hostile and loud Tiffany had been the evening before, hearing a polite, level-headed guy from Williamsburg immediately defend me to Katie—and treat our twin bond like the most natural, admirable thing in the world—made Brandon seem like a breath of fresh air.

For the next forty-five minutes, the three of us sat together around that shaded patio table at The Admiral Center. When I pulled a cold can of ginger ale out of my backpack, Brandon mentioned that he didn’t care for alcohol or coffee either and preferred apple juice, sports drinks, or hot chocolate—which made Katie and me exchange a delighted twin grin. He told us he was twenty-two years old, lived up in Williamsburg on Virginia Avenue a few blocks from the College of Charles & Anne, and worked in hospitality bookkeeping while taking business courses.

At two-thirty, Brandon glanced down at his leather wristwatch and stood up reluctantly from the wrought-iron chair.

“I promised my supervisor I’d be back up in Williamsburg by four o’clock to close out the weekend ledgers, so I’d better head back toward the bridge-tunnel before Sunday afternoon traffic backs up,” Brandon said, smiling warmly down at Katie. “Katie, meeting you today was the best part of my whole week. I’d really love to show you around Williamsburg sometime soon—my apartment on Virginia Avenue is on the ground floor with zero steps, and the Williamsburg Transportation Center is right down the street with accessible CTTA buses that run all through the historic area.”

Katie blushed slightly, smoothing her royal-blue sweater over her lap before looking up at Brandon with clear, honest blue eyes.

“I’d really like to see Williamsburg someday, Brandon,” Katie said softly, “and thank you so much for being so kind to me today. After everything that happened yesterday, though—and with Nate and me living in separate apartments for the first time in our lives—I really want to take things slow and get to know you here in Norfolk first.”

I watched Brandon’s face closely to see if he would look disappointed or try to talk her out of it.

Instead, Brandon’s smile only grew warmer and more respectful.

“I respect that completely, Katie,” Brandon said without a trace of pressure in his voice, pulling a small business card out of his shirt pocket and writing his home and cell numbers neatly on the back before handing it to her. “Taking things slow is the smart way to do it, and I don’t want you rushing into anything you aren’t a hundred percent comfortable with. I love visiting Norfolk anyway—it’s an easy trip down I-64 on the weekends. If it’s alright with you and Nate, I’d love to come down here to Ghent next Saturday afternoon, bring you two some hot chocolate, and go completely at your pace.”

“I’d really like that,” Katie smiled, slipping his card carefully into her zippered purse.

“And it was great meeting you too, Nate,” Brandon added, shaking my hand warmly again before waving goodbye and walking down the brick promenade toward the parking lot.

As soon as Brandon turned the corner past Chapters & Co., Katie rolled her SwiftChair two inches closer to mine and took my hand.

“Well?” Katie asked, echoing the exact question I had asked her inside Apartment A6 four months earlier on the afternoon she met Tiffany. “What did you think of him, Nate?”

Looking back down the sunny brick walkway where Brandon had just bought my twin sister fresh hot chocolate, defended me without hesitation, and promised to respect her boundaries and go completely at her pace, I smiled and squeezed Katie’s hand back.

“He seems like a genuinely good guy, Katie,” I said honestly. “I like how he didn’t push you at all when you told him you wanted to take things slow, and it meant a lot to me that he knew last night wasn’t my fault. Let’s roll back to A6 and spend the rest of Sunday afternoon together before I have to catch the evening Route 1 bus back to Ocean View.”

Part 3: Patience at Katie’s Pace, Winning Over Nate and Dad, & Katie’s Move to Williamsburg

Date: 2004-11-20 at 14:00 America/New_York

Saturday, November 20, 2004, 2:00 PM — Two Months at Katie's Pace & The Decision in Apartment A6

"Look how neatly Brandon labeled all of the computer cables with masking tape before putting them in the box, Nate," nineteen-year-old Katie said with a warm smile on the Saturday afternoon before Thanksgiving in November 2004, rolling her compact SwiftChair back from the long workstation desk inside Apartment A6 on Greenway Court so our dad David could lift her seventeen-inch CRT monitor into its padded carton.

Standing beside the desk with a roll of clear packing tape in his hand and his steaming travel mug of black coffee resting on the kitchenette counter next to three cold bottles of sports drink and orange juice, forty-six-year-old Dad looked across the room toward twenty-two-year-old Brandon Mercer, who was carefully wrapping Katie's glass butterfly paperweight in air-cushioned packing wrap on his knees.

"You've got a good system, Brandon," Dad said approvingly. "Most guys your age just toss all the cords into a grocery bag and spend three days figuring out what plugs into what."

"My dad taught me early on that if you take your time and do things carefully, nothing gets broken," Brandon replied with that calm, polite smile that had won over our entire family since September.

Sitting in my SwiftChair beside the kitchenette counter, I watched Brandon tape the air-cushioned packing wrap around Katie's paperweight and felt a complicated mixture of happiness for my twin sister and a quiet ache in my chest that she was moving forty-five miles up Interstate 64 to Williamsburg.

True to the promise he had made at The Admiral Center on that Sunday afternoon in September, Brandon hadn't rushed Katie for a single day. All through late September, October, and November, Brandon had respected Katie's wish to take things slow and get to know him right here in Norfolk. Every single Saturday and Sunday, rain or shine, he had driven down I-64 from Williamsburg to West Ghent. He brought Katie cups of hot chocolate from the bakery and cartons of chocolate milk for her dorm fridge; he carried her laundry basket down the hall and chatted warmly with our across-the-hall neighbors Michael and Ashley before Michael finished moving out of Apartment A5 earlier this month; he sat beside her wheelchair at the workstation desk while she finished her CCHR homework; and whenever Dad drove down to take us out to dinner, Brandon pulled out chairs, opened doors, and spoke with the steady, respectful courtesy of a young man who genuinely cherished my twin sister.

And during those exact same autumn months between September and November 2004, while Brandon was treating Katie like gold every weekend in Ghent, my own life up in West Ocean View at Sea Breeze West Apartment 3 had been sliding downhill so gradually that I barely knew how to explain it even to myself.

When Tiffany and I had first moved into Apartment 3 back in August, I had genuinely believed we were going to build a normal grown-up romance together—sharing the queen bed in the back bedroom, kissing goodnight, cuddling under the covers, and figuring that once we were settled in and ready, our relationship would naturally take the next step the way adult couples do when they are in love. Yet before moving out of Greenway Court, Katie and I had promised each other that neither of us would rush into anything sexual that could risk an unplanned pregnancy while we were still adjusting to living apart for the first time in our lives. And as it turned out, that waiting period had barely begun before Tiffany's warmth dried up on its own. Almost as soon as the Sea Breeze West lease was signed, the affectionate girlfriend who had held an umbrella over my joystick in the rain started turning cold and irritable whenever I came near her, leaving unwashed dishes in the sink for days at a time, banishing milk from our refrigerator, and picking jealous fights over my twin sister until sharing our bedroom felt more like walking on eggshells than being in love.

Whenever I mentioned riding the CVTA Route 1 bus down to Greenway Court on a Saturday afternoon to visit Katie, Tiffany would suddenly complain of a migraine, or her mother Sandra would show up unannounced at Apartment 3 demanding that I stay home to help reorganize the living room, or Tiffany would start a guilt-tripping argument asking why she wasn't enough company for me. Week by week, my trips down Granby Street had grown fewer and further between. Because I was too embarrassed to admit to Katie or Dad how bad the mess and the arguments at Apartment 3 had gotten, I kept telling them over the phone that I was just busy—which meant that Monday through Friday, nineteen-year-old Katie had been coming home to an empty studio apartment at the back of Greenway Court, eating dinner by herself at half of a workstation desk, and sleeping alone in the square walk-in closet where the two of us used to zip up in our shared sleeping bag together.

Once Michael vacated Apartment A5 across the hall earlier in November, leaving both back apartments on the first floor quiet at night, Brandon had seen how lonely Katie was sitting in Apartment A6 all by herself while I was stuck up in Ocean View. Two weeks ago, Brandon had sat down with Katie, Dad, and me over Sunday lunch and made the gentlest, most reasonable pitch imaginable.

Why keep paying rent on a studio apartment in West Ghent where Katie had to sit alone staring at Nate's empty half of the desk through Thanksgiving and Christmas, Brandon had asked kindly, when Katie was ready to move into his ground-floor one-bedroom apartment on Virginia Avenue in Williamsburg? His apartment was completely step-free on the first floor; it was only blocks away from the College of Charles & Anne and the Williamsburg Transportation Center, where the Colonial Triangle Transit Authority buses, the Pathfinder intercity coaches, and the ARTS passenger train stopped every day; and Katie could work and commute by bus while never having to come home to an empty room again.

Because Brandon had spent the entire autumn earning every ounce of our trust—and because Katie genuinely loved how attentive and gentle he was with her—Katie had said yes, and both Dad and I had given them our blessing.

"That's the last of the kitchen cartons," Dad said, carrying the rolling microwave-and-toaster cart out toward the hallway so he could load it into the back of his pickup alongside Brandon's sedan in the front parking lot. "Brandon, let's you and me run these three boxes out to the vehicles while Nate and Katie have a few minutes before we lock up."

"You got it, Mr. Prairie," Brandon said, picking up two taped boxes of books and following Dad out into the first-floor corridor.

As soon as the wooden door of Apartment A6 clicked half-shut behind them, the studio felt cavernously quiet. Only the bare full-sized mattress, the empty workstation desk, and the open door of the empty square walk-in closet remained.

Katie released her joystick brake, rolled her SwiftChair across the vacuumed carpet right up beside mine, and took both of my hands.

“You’re quiet today, Nate,” Katie said softly, her blue eyes searching mine the way they always did whenever I was holding something inside. “Are you okay with me moving up to Williamsburg?”

“I want you to be happy, Katie,” I said, my voice catching slightly as I squeezed her fingers. “I hated knowing you were sitting down here in A6 all by yourself every weeknight while I was up in Ocean View. Brandon has been so patient and good to you all autumn, and I know you won’t be lonely up there with him. Just… remember our pact, okay? Take things at your own pace, and don’t let anyone rush you into anything you aren’t ready for—especially anything that could get you pregnant or put your health at risk.”

“I remember, Nate, and I won’t,” Katie promised earnestly, squeezing my hands right back. “Brandon already knows I want to keep taking things slow even after we’re sharing a bedroom, and he promised he’s completely fine with just holding me and taking our time until we’re settled. Besides, Williamsburg is just right up I-64 on the Peninsula. The Williamsburg Transportation Center is right down the street from Brandon’s apartment on Virginia Avenue. CTTA buses run right from the station down to Lee Hall to connect with CVTA routes in Newport News, and we still have our phones and instant messaging every single day. Promise me you’ll call me whenever Tiffany is at work so we can talk just the two of us?”

“Twin’s promise,” I whispered against her hair, holding my sister close inside the studio apartment that had been our very first home as adults. “And if you ever need me for anything at all—day or night—you call me or come straight down to Ocean View, okay?”

“I will, Nate,” Katie smiled, sitting back and wiping a tiny tear from her eyelashes as Dad and Brandon walked back down the hallway to pick up the final computer boxes. “Everything is going to be great for both of us.”

Twenty minutes later, outside in the crisp November sunshine by the circular brick lamppost planter in front of the Greenway Court building, Katie transferred into the front passenger seat of Brandon’s sedan while Brandon and Dad carefully folded and stowed her compact SwiftChair in the trunk.

As Brandon’s car pulled out of the parking lot onto Greenway Court heading toward Interstate 64 West and Williamsburg, and I rolled down the sidewalk toward Granby Street to catch the northbound Route 1 bus back to Tiffany and Sea Breeze West Apartment 3, Katie waved to me through the passenger window with two crossed fingers pressed against the glass.

For the first time in nineteen years, my twin sister and I were living in two different cities.

Part 4: The Worst Christmas Ever: Eighteen Stops to Dirty Old Tonomy Hill, Four Days with Cousin Chelsea, & The West Main Road Shortcut Home

Date: 2004-12-24 at 15:30 America/New_York

Friday, December 24, 2004, 3:30 PM — Eighteen Stops to Dirty Old Tonomy Hill & The Worst Christmas Ever

“Another girl,” twenty-year-old Tiffany retorted, with what sounded like a sharp hint of anger in her voice, as the blue-and-white Ocean State Transit Authority Route 63 bus hissed away from the curb on Dirty Old Tonomy Hill on Friday afternoon, Christmas Eve, and left the two of us in the biting Rhode Island December wind outside the weathered World War II-era public housing buildings.

“I thought I told you that all my cousins are women. There really are no men in my life,” I replied from my compact SwiftChair, answering that exact question for what seemed like the millionth time while my cold fingers gripped the joystick controller.

We were in Newport, Rhode Island—my dad David’s birthplace and childhood home—at the end of an exhausting overnight and daylong Pathfinder bus marathon that had left every muscle in my shoulders and back aching. Because our Aunt Elizabeth had died earlier that year from her lifelong smoking, and our grandmother had passed away not long before her, our twenty-two-year-old cousin Chelsea was facing her very first Christmas without her mother. When Dad had helped buy my Pathfinder ticket up to Rhode Island so Chelsea wouldn’t spend Christmas completely alone, I had originally hoped Katie and I would make the trip together. Instead, with Katie now living up in Williamsburg with Brandon, Tiffany had flatly refused to hear of Katie coming with us and insisted on making the multi-day holiday trip with me herself.

Getting from Norfolk to Newport by bus on Christmas Eve had been a grueling eighteen-leg haul up the Eastern Seaboard, with drivers unfolding the coach wheelchair lift for my SwiftChair at four separate transfer terminals along the way. We had started at the downtown Pathfinder station in Norfolk, rolled across the harbor to Hampton and up I-64 to the Williamsburg station, and ridden into Richmond, where we changed buses for the run north through Fredericksburg and Springfield into Washington, D.C. In Washington we changed buses a second time, riding north into Downtown Baltimore on West Fayette Street—where our driver had to exit I-95 onto I-395 and crawl through block after block of congested downtown Baltimore traffic lights—before continuing up through Newark, Delaware and Philadelphia into the crowded underground gates of the Port Authority Bus Terminal in New York City. After changing buses a third time in Manhattan, we had rolled up the Connecticut coast through Bridgeport and New Haven, passed through the steel skyline of Braxton, Rhode Island and downtown Providence, and pulled into Boston’s South Station—where we changed buses a fourth time for the run south through Fall River, Massachusetts into the Newport Gateway Center, finally paying our cash fare onto the local OSTA Route 63 bus up to Tonomy Hill.

In December 2004, Tonomy Hill—which everyone in Newport called Dirty Old Tonomy Hill—was still a sprawling complex of faded, aging World War II-era defense-worker public housing apartments perched on the wind-swept ridge on the north side of town.

Before Tiffany could make another angry remark on the cracked concrete walk, the front door of the nearest World War II-era building swung open.

“Welcome to Newport!” cried a voice as I saw my cousin Chelsea hurrying down the low wooden entry ramp toward my wheelchair as fast as her struggling gait would carry her and pulling me into a tight squeeze hug. “I hope you enjoy Christmas with me,” she whispered against my coat collar, her speech slurred due to her developmental disability.

A single tear leaked from the corner of her eye. Aunt Liz’s heavy smoking while pregnant was the reason Chelsea had been born developmentally delayed and with severe chronic asthma that required her to keep both her regular maintenance inhaler and her rescue inhaler with her at all times—yet Aunt Liz was still her mother, and facing this first Christmas without her weighed heavily on Chelsea’s heart.

“You like my boyfriend?” Tiffany asked beside us, disgusted.

“He and Katie are my only family, my only cousins,” Chelsea replied excitedly, not fully comprehending the hostile meaning behind Tiffany’s words. She took us into the apartment building and up the interior ramp into her living room. “You two make yourselves comfortable on the couch. I’m going to take a badly needed shower.”

“She seems to really like you a lot,” Tiffany groaned as soon as the bathroom door clicked shut and the water began running.

“She doesn’t understand some things about life,” I said, none too happily, braking my SwiftChair near the sofa. “She hasn’t seen me since we were younger and she’s just very excited to see me. Think about how you feel about your brother when he comes to town.”

Tiffany didn’t respond to that comparison, but our arguments went back and forth across the living room—with Tiffany’s voice rising into harsh, angry screaming—when suddenly we heard the bathroom door fly open.

Because the sound of Tiffany screaming at me through the bathroom wall was so distressing to Chelsea that she genuinely feared for my safety—deciding in an instant that protecting her cousin was far more important than her modesty—Chelsea came running out of the shower soaking wet and completely naked, dripping soapy water across the floor without a care in the world that she was standing there wearing nothing at all.

“Why are you two fighting?” she asked in a frightened, slurred voice.

Tiffany was startled by her sudden appearance in the buff, and immediately seemed angry that I wasn’t shocked at all. Keeping my eyes respectfully averted toward the hallway wall, I was remembering from childhood—like the Christmas at our house in Virginia Beach when we were nine—that our family constantly had to remind Chelsea to stay dressed, and that she sometimes ran around the house naked when she was younger without realizing she needed clothes on.

“Come on, Chelsea, let’s get you dried off and dressed,” I said calmly, rolling my SwiftChair forward, grabbing a large dry bath towel off the hall shelf, and guiding her back into the bathroom. “Tiffany doesn’t grasp that you don’t understand some things.”

Closing the bathroom door behind us and wrapping the thick towel completely around her shoulders to cover her, I added gently, “I remember when you’d run around the place naked when we were kids, Cous.”

“I wish it was just you and Katie,” she whimpered, her chest hitching with a tight asthmatic wheeze as she started to have a full emotional breakdown. After taking a shaky puff from the rescue inhaler she kept right beside the sink alongside her regular inhaler, she started holding onto me tightly, scared out of her mind by Tiffany’s screaming.

“Let’s get you dressed and try to have a good time,” I said softly, rubbing the towel over her shoulders to dry my cousin off as best as I could while keeping her completely covered so her dignity stayed in place.

Friday, December 24 – Monday, December 27, 2004 — The Christmas Eve Nightmare, Four Days Under Siege, & The West Main Road Shortcut Home

“She seems to have a crush on you,” Tiffany spat quietly right after the three of us finished Christmas Eve dinner.

“Please don’t be mean to her. There are some things she doesn’t understand,” I tried to explain again to Tiffany.

“I really don’t give a damn,” Tiffany snapped out loud. “First you have a sister and now a cousin. I’m starting to wonder where your loyalties are!”

“I don’t care when you’re close with your brother,” I replied, my temper starting to rise as Chelsea stood by the counter and started tearing up. “Now look, she’s crying! You frightened her! Look, I’m really the only family she has left along with my sister. Her mother—my aunt—died. Our grandmother died. She has no one but herself here in Newport. I’m the closest family, being in Virginia! So what if she loves me? She doesn’t understand certain concepts such as the difference between family love and girlfriend love!”

Chelsea tugged at my arm as she was heavily in tears, wheezing through her sobs as she pulled me toward her bedroom.

“Just him!” Chelsea sobbed angrily when Tiffany stood up and tried to follow us into the room. The moment my wheelchair rolled inside, Chelsea slammed the bedroom door in Tiffany’s face and turned the lock.

“She’s mean to you and she’s mean to me!” Chelsea sobbed as she reached for her inhalers on the dresser and then immediately started pulling off her clothes to get into bed, blurting out through her tears without any filter at all, “I don’t care that I’m naked. I always sleep naked!”

Keeping my eyes fixed on her tear-streaked face while I reached out and pulled the heavy bed quilt all the way up over her shoulders to keep her covered, I tried to calm my cousin down. She was an absolute emotional wreck.

“It’s Christmas Eve. Let’s try to salvage it?” I asked gently.

“Promise you will never bring her again. Only Katie! Tiffany’s mean to you and me too!” Chelsea was sobbing with very heavy tears streaming from her eyes, and there was nothing else I could get out of her.

“Chelsea, could we please try to salvage tonight?” I asked softly, wanting her to stop crying.

She didn’t respond as her crying intensified. Instead, terrified that if I rolled back out into the living room Tiffany would start screaming at me all over again, Chelsea clutched my sleeve through her tears and insisted that I transfer out of my wheelchair and climb into bed beside her—with me staying fully dressed in my jeans and sweater on top of the sheet under the edge of the quilt while she clung to my arm—so she wouldn’t have to hear Tiffany and me fight.

There was going to be no changing Chelsea’s mind: she hated my girlfriend with every fiber of her body, and my girlfriend hated her just as much.

Because our return Pathfinder tickets weren’t scheduled until Monday after Christmas, we were stuck at Tonomy Hill for three full nights—Christmas Eve, Christmas Day, and Sunday night. Every single day, whenever Chelsea hugged me or kissed my cheek the way she always had since we were little kids, Tiffany glared at her with open fury and hissed at me that my cousin had a crush on me. Because of Chelsea’s developmental disability, she genuinely didn’t understand what made family love different from romantic love; I had never once in my life stopped Chelsea from hugging or kissing me in the past, and I wasn’t about to start pushing her away now and scare my grieving cousin who simply didn’t understand how life worked sometimes. And every single night of the visit, refusing to listen to Tiffany yell at me in the living room, Chelsea locked her bedroom door against Tiffany and made me stay in her room with her until morning—leaving Tiffany out on the living-room sofa, seething with rage.

By Monday morning, December 27, when it was finally time to head back to Virginia, the tension inside the apartment was suffocating.

Looking at our printed Pathfinder return tickets, Chelsea noticed a problem right away: our tickets started at the Newport Gateway Center on a local bus to Fall River, Massachusetts, where we were supposed to change buses for a connecting run to Providence that departed only five minutes later. Even with her developmental delays, Chelsea knew Newport transit cold—and she knew that with a driver having to unload my SwiftChair on the wheelchair lift in Fall River, a five-minute transfer window meant we would miss the connecting bus to Providence for sure.

“Don’t go down to the Gateway Center for the Fall River bus,” Chelsea told us earnestly by the front door, taking a puff of her regular morning inhaler and pointing past the World War II-era buildings toward the paved walking path that cut down the eastern slope of Tonomy Hill. “Take the walking path right over to West Main Road and catch the OSTA Route 60 bus straight to Kennedy Plaza in Providence. Then you won’t miss your New York bus.”

Giving Chelsea one last tight hug at the top of the ramp—and whispering in her ear that next time it really would be just Katie and me—I rolled down the Tonomy Hill walking path with a silent, fuming Tiffany walking beside me out to West Main Road.

Just as Chelsea had promised, the blue-and-white OSTA Route 60 bus picked us up on West Main Road, carried us north across Aquidneck Island and over the Mount Hope Bridge straight into Kennedy Plaza in downtown Providence with plenty of time to spare, and let us board our scheduled Pathfinder NYC Express right on our Newport tickets without ever setting foot in Fall River.

From Providence, the NYC Express carried us nonstop down to the Port Authority Bus Terminal in New York City, where we changed buses for the southbound run through Philadelphia and Wilmington, Delaware into Maryland. Unlike our northbound trip that had crawled through the traffic lights of Downtown Baltimore on Fayette Street, our southbound driver stayed right on I-95 and pulled into the highway-side bus bays at the Baltimore Travel Plaza on O'Donnell Street for a quick break before continuing into Washington, D.C.

In Washington we changed buses again, rolling south down I-95 through Fredericksburg into Richmond, where we made our final Pathfinder bus change for the last leg down Interstate 64 toward Hampton Roads.

An hour east of Richmond, the coach exited the interstate and pulled into the bus bays at the Williamsburg Transportation Center.

Staring out the tinted coach window at the brick station platform under the evening streetlights, my heart gave a hard, sudden thud against my ribs. Two blocks down the street from that platform, on Virginia Avenue, was my twin sister Katie. Beside me in the double seat, Tiffany had her arms crossed tightly over her chest, still radiating cold fury over Chelsea and the four days in Newport.

For two full minutes while the driver stood outside by the open luggage bay, I gripped my armrests and seriously considered calling out to the driver to bring my SwiftChair out of the bay right now—getting off the bus right here in Williamsburg, rolling down Virginia Avenue to Katie's front door, and telling my twin sister the whole truth about how miserable I was.

Then the driver swung the luggage bay doors shut, climbed back up the steps, and released the air brakes. Swallowing the lump in my throat, I stayed in my seat beside Tiffany as the coach pulled out of Williamsburg, rolled through Hampton and across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel into Downtown Norfolk, and dropped us at the Norfolk terminal—where Tiffany and I transferred in silence onto the northbound CVTA Route 1 bus back to our apartment in Ocean View.

Part 5: Five Buses from Williamsburg — The Ninety-Second Window, Crown Burger, & The Last Route 61 Across the Water

Date: 2005-11-12 at 15:38 America/New_York

Saturday, November 12, 2005, 3:38 PM — Virginia Avenue, The Canadian Healthcare Lie, & The Only Arms That Felt Safe

Rain lashed against the living room window of the ground-floor apartment on Virginia Avenue near the College of Charles and Anne as Brandon yanked the zipper shut on his overstuffed canvas duffel bag and dropped it onto the carpet beside the front door.

“Once we cross that river into Windsor tomorrow, all the red tape you’ve been whining about down here disappears,” Brandon said, pacing past the front of my SwiftChair while he shoved a printed stack of internet maps into his coat pocket. “Canada has universal healthcare, Katie. Every prescription you take, every physical therapy visit, every wheelchair motor part—all of it is completely free up there. We won’t need your father’s insurance, and we won’t need your brother meddling in our business.”

I kept my eyes fixed on my canvas messenger bag resting across my lap, my hands folded tightly over the flap where my birth certificate folder, my wallet with my state identification card, my daily maintenance medication pouch, and my flip phone were tucked inside. Even at twenty years old, I knew enough about how government eligibility rules worked to know that two United States citizens cannot just roll off a tunnel bus in Ontario on a tourist pass and be handed provincial health cards. Brandon hadn’t researched a single residency requirement. He was lying to himself —or lying to me—because the truth didn’t matter to him once he got me across an international line where I couldn’t get back.

Brandon stopped right behind my shoulders and clamped both of his heavy palms down onto the rubber push-handles of my chair, leaning over the top of my backrest so his breath brushed my ear.

“Up there, it’s going to be just you and me,” Brandon murmured, sliding his hands down from the handles to wrap his arms awkwardly and tightly around my shoulders from behind. “I’m going to be the one taking care of you from now on, Katie. Just me. Nobody else.”

I stiffened against the backrest, holding my breath until he let go.

Even after fourteen months in Williamsburg, Brandon still had no idea how to hug me properly. He always grabbed me from above or behind while standing over my wheelchair, pressing down on my collarbone and pinning my arms against my armrests so I felt trapped in a vise. Every time his hands touched my shoulders now, my skin crawled. I didn’t want him touching me anymore.

Through the rain-streaked light beside the door, I glanced at the red numbers on my digital clock radio sitting on the end table: three-thirty-eight in the afternoon.

Our northbound ARTS train wasn’t scheduled to pull into the Williamsburg station until early evening, yet Brandon insisted on marching over to North Boundary Street two hours early so he could buy the multi-city rail and tunnel-bus vouchers in cash at the counter before the afternoon clerk went off shift.

As he bent down to lace up his boots by the door, a memory flashed sharp and clear behind my eyes. Two weeks earlier, when we had crossed North Boundary Street past the brick train depot, I had seen a white-and-colonial-blue Colonial Triangle Transit Authority bus idling at the north end of the station island with NEWPORT NEWS glowing across its front destination sign.

At the time, it had just been a passing detail on a street corner. Now, at three-thirty-eight on a freezing Saturday afternoon with Brandon slinging his duffel bag over his shoulder, that bus sign was the only lifeline left between me and the Canadian border.

There was only one man on this earth I wanted right now, and he was forty-five miles away across the harbor in West Ocean View.

My chest ached so fiercely for Nate that my throat closed up. I didn't want Canada, and I didn't want a boyfriend hovering over my wheelchair pretending to be my savior. I wanted my twin brother. I wanted to be back in a quiet, dark closet with the door shut against the world and a heavy sleeping bag zipped up around the two of us on the carpet, just like we had done in our West Ghent studio apartment whenever the noise and the fear of the outside world got too loud to bear. I wanted to curl up against Nate's chest in the pitch dark, feel his arms wrap around me at my own level without pinning me down, and breathe in the familiar, safe warmth of his cuddles—the only set of arms in the world where my nervous system ever went completely still.

"Come on, switch your drive levers to freewheel and get your hood up," Brandon ordered, pulling the apartment door open to the cold November wind and grabbing my rear push-handles again before I could even touch my joystick. "We're walking over to the depot right now so I can get the tickets printed at the window."

As my tires rolled out onto the wet sidewalk of Virginia Avenue toward North Boundary Street, I kept my left hand pressed over my messenger bag and stared straight ahead through the rain.

The second Brandon walked inside that station building to stand in line at the ticket counter, I wasn't waiting for him to come back out. I was going to find that Newport News bus, and I was going home to my brother.

Saturday, November 12, 2005, 3:55 PM — North Boundary Street, The Windsor Tickets, & The Ninety-Second Window onto the CTTA Grey Line

Cold November rain slanted sideways under the dark green overhang of the Williamsburg Transportation Center, spattering against the brick columns along North Boundary Street and soaking the knees of my jeans.

Behind my shoulders, Brandon took his hands off the rubber push-handles of my SwiftChair just long enough to reach down to my rear drive motors and flip both of my motor-brake levers into the locked park position—and then reached over my right shoulder to switch off my armrest joystick controller—parking me under the dripping eaves ten feet from the heavy wooden doors of the depot waiting room. Slung across my lap under my raincoat was my canvas messenger bag, holding my wallet with my state identification card, my birth certificate folder, my daily maintenance medication pouch, and my cell phone.

"Stay right here under the awning and don't move an inch," Brandon said, adjusting the strap of his overstuffed duffel bag across his chest as he glanced through the glass doors at the ARTS ticket counter inside. "The clerk has to print the multi-city rail and tunnel bus vouchers through Washington and Toledo up to Windsor manually at the window. As soon as I have the tickets in my hand, we're rolling out to the platform for the northbound train, and by tomorrow afternoon we'll be across the Canadian border."

My stomach twisted so hard my throat burned. I looked down at my rain-speckled footrests so he wouldn't see the panic in my eyes. I didn't want to get on that train. I didn't want to go to Michigan or Canada, and I didn't want to spend another hour trapped in a room with a man who had spent the last fourteen months cutting me off from my dad and my twin brother.

"You hear me, Katie?" Brandon asked sharply, tapping two fingers against the top of my headrest. "Wait right here. I'll be back in three minutes."

He turned, pushed through the heavy brass-and-glass doors of the station house, and stepped into the queue behind two college students at the indoor ARTS ticket counter.

For five seconds, I sat frozen under the whistling wind, listening to the wet hiss of tires out on Boundary Street.

Then, forty feet to my left along the curved transit island at the north end of the brick plaza, air brakes sighed against the slick pavement.

A white-and-colonial-blue bus with Colonial Triangle Transit Authority painted across its flank pulled into the end bay beneath the bus shelter. Above its wide windshield, the amber electronic destination sign cycled through two words that made my heart slam against my ribs:

GREY LINE — NEWPORT NEWS / LEE HALL.

I didn't have a printed Coastal Virginia Transit Authority timetable in my bag, and I had no idea what transfers it would take to get all the way across the harbor on a rainy Saturday afternoon. All I knew was the map of the Peninsula Dad and Nate and I had memorized when we were teenagers: Newport News sat straight down Route 60 toward Hampton and the bridge-tunnel, and once you reached Lee Hall in Newport News, the blue-and-gold CVTA buses ran south into the heart of the city and across the water to Norfolk.

Through the tall multipane window of the depot waiting room, I caught a glimpse of Brandon's back. He had just stepped up to the counter, pulling his wallet out of his back pocket while the ticket agent typed into her terminal.

It was now or never. If I waited ninety more seconds, Brandon would walk back through those doors with two one-way train tickets to the Canadian border, and I might never see Nate or Dad again.

My right hand trembled as I pressed the power button on my armrest controller, saw the green battery lights flash to life, and pushed my joystick full forward.

My SwiftChair hummed across the wet brick pavers of the platform, splashes of rainwater kicking up off my front casters as I rolled straight past the station overhang toward the bus bay. Up at the front doors of the CTTA coach, the driver spotted my wheelchair coming through the rain and immediately flipped his toggle switch.

The front air suspension knelt with a loud pneumatic whoosh, and the hydraulic aluminum ramp unfolded and clanged down onto the wet concrete curb.

I didn’t look back toward the station doors. I lined my front casters up with the yellow side rails, drove straight up the steep wet diamond-plate incline into the warm interior of the bus, and spun my chair around in the front vestibule to back into the forward wheelchair securement bay.

“Nasty rain out there this afternoon, sweetheart,” the driver said kindly, rising from his seat to pull the four SafeLock floor straps out from their retractors and hook them onto my frame. “Where are you headed down the line?”

“All the way to the Lee Hall transfer stop in Newport News, please,” I said, my voice shaking so hard I barely recognized it as I pulled a crumpled dollar bill and two quarters out of my coat pocket and pushed them into the farebox slot.

“Lee Hall it is,” the driver said, clicking the lap belt across my waist and stepping back up to his seat. “Hang on tight.”

He hit the switch. The hydraulic ramp folded up inside the doorway, the dual glass doors hissed shut, and the driver released the air brakes, pulling the bus out of the Williamsburg Transportation Center bay and turning left onto North Boundary Street.

As the coach accelerated past the south end of the brick station house, I looked out through the rain-streaked left window.

Right at that exact second, the heavy wooden doors of the depot swung open.

Brandon walked out onto the wet brick platform holding a yellow paper ARTS ticket jacket in his right hand. He took two steps toward the spot under the overhang where he had left me—and stopped dead in his tracks, staring at the empty patch of wet brick.

Even through the pouring rain and fifty feet of distance, I saw his head whip frantically to the left, then to the right, his mouth dropping open as he scanned the empty platform. A second later, he shoved the train tickets into his coat pocket and yanked his cell phone out of his belt clip.

Inside my canvas bag on my lap, my phone began to vibrate against my leg.

I reached into my bag, pulled out my flip phone, and stared down at the glowing outside screen as the CTTA bus turned the corner onto Lafayette Street and left the Williamsburg train station behind in the rain.

BRANDON MERCER — CALLING.

I didn’t flip the phone open. Instead, I held down the side volume button to silence the ringer, let the call go unanswered to voicemail, and watched the streetlamps of Williamsburg blur past in the November dusk as the bus carried me south toward Newport News and my brother.

Saturday, November 12, 2005, 4:30 PM — Lee Hall, CVTA Route 116, & Warm Food and a Clean Restroom at Crown Burger

For thirty minutes down Pocahontas Trail alongside the freight railroad tracks, my flip phone vibrated inside my canvas bag every three minutes like a trapped hornet.

Each time the little outer screen lit up with Brandon's name, I kept my thumb pressed over the side button to mute it without opening the hinge. If I answered—even for five seconds to tell him we were finished—he would hear the diesel engine of the bus or the automated stop chime and figure out I was heading south down the Peninsula toward Newport News instead of hiding somewhere in Williamsburg.

At exactly four-thirty, the CTTA Grey Line bus pulled off Warwick Boulevard onto the shoulder at Elmhurst Drive in Lee Hall, right behind a waiting white-and-blue Coastal Virginia Transit Authority low-floor transit coach idling at the transfer shelter with 116 MALL-HALL LOOP glowing across its headsign.

"Right on time for your CVTA connection," the Grey Line driver smiled, unclipping my four floor straps and lowering the front ramp into the drizzle. "Tell the 116 operator I held the horn for you!"

Rolling thirty feet through the rain from one ramp straight up onto the next, I dropped my fare into the CVTA farebox, asked the operator for a paper transfer slip, and backed into the forward bay as Route 116 pulled back onto Warwick Boulevard heading south.

Fifteen minutes later, at four-forty-five, the bus turned into the transfer stop at the corner of Warwick Boulevard and Denbigh Boulevard beside the Newport Crossing Shopping Center.

"If you're heading downtown toward the shipyard and the transit center, honey, Route 106 pulls in right here at five o'clock, and Route 107 comes through at five-thirty," the woman sitting across the aisle told me kindly as the driver unhooked my straps.

"Thank you, ma'am," I said, rolling down the ramp onto the wet sidewalk.

Through the rain across the intersection, the glowing red-and-gold sign of a Crown Burger restaurant shone against the gray four-forty-five twilight. My stomach cramped so sharply I had to press my left forearm across my waist. In the chaos of Brandon spending the whole afternoon packing his duffel bag, demanding my birth certificate folder, and marching me over to North Boundary Street, I hadn't eaten a single bite of food since a piece of toast at eight o'clock that morning—and after nearly an hour of sheer adrenaline in the cold rain, I badly needed to use a restroom.

If I caught the five o'clock Route 106 bus in fifteen minutes, I wouldn't have time to eat or use a bathroom all the way down to the bottom of Newport News. If I skipped the five o'clock bus and caught the five-thirty Route 107 instead, I had forty-five minutes right here.

Steering my SwiftChair across the crosswalk into the warm, french-fry-scented lobby of the Crown Burger at Warwick and Denbigh, I rolled straight back to the single-user accessible restroom first.

Locking the heavy door behind me, I transferred cautiously with the wall grab bar, used the clean restroom, and washed my face with warm water and paper towels at the roll-under sink. Looking into the clean mirror above the faucet, I barely recognized the pale, rain-streaked twenty-year-old girl staring back at me—until I thought of Nate waiting across the water in Norfolk and felt the steel come back into my spine.

Rolling back out to the front counter at five minutes past five, I ordered a warm junior cheeseburger, a small order of salted fries, and a cup of tap water from the dollar menu. Parking my wheelchair at the farthest corner table where I could watch the Warwick Boulevard bus stop through the plate-glass window, I ate every crumb of the hot burger and fries while my phone buzzed twice more in my bag with silent voicemails from Brandon.

At five-twenty-four, with warm food in my stomach and my raincoat zipped up to my chin, I rolled back out to the curb at Warwick and Denbigh just as the headlights of CVTA Route 107—signed 107 DOWNTOWN / 6TH & IVY—pulled up to the shelter right on schedule at five-thirty.

Saturday, November 12, 2005, 6:10 PM — Newport News Transit Center, The Disgusting Women's Restroom, & The Last Route 61 of the Night

By the time Route 107 wound its way south through Hilton Village and pulled under the high canopy of the Newport News Transit Center downtown at six-ten, night had fallen completely and the November rain had intensified into a freezing coastal downpour.

"When is the next bus across the water to Norfolk?" I asked the Route 107 operator as he unclipped my tie-down hooks.

"Bay D across the island—Route 61 at six-forty-five," the driver answered, glancing at his wristwatch. "And don't miss it, sweetheart. On Saturday nights, that six-forty-five bus is the very last Route 61 across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel until tomorrow morning."

A cold shiver ran down my neck. Thirty-five minutes until the last bus of the night across the harbor—and if I missed it, I would be stranded on the Peninsula overnight on the exact same side of the water as Brandon.

Because the rain was blowing sideways under the outdoor bus bays and I wanted to make sure I didn't need a bathroom before a long cross-harbor ride through the bridge-tunnel and Norfolk, I steered my SwiftChair through the sliding doors into the indoor waiting area of the Newport News Transit Center and pushed open the heavy door to the women's restroom.

The instant the door swung open, the stench hit me like a wall, and I stopped my wheels dead on the threshold.

It was, without question, the most disgusting public restroom I had ever seen in my life.

Above the two stained porcelain sinks, the entire left half of the wall mirror had been ripped clean off the wall, leaving a jagged rectangle of bare, splintered plywood dotted with hardened round blobs of black mastic glue. Inside the accessible stall at the end of the row, the metal toilet paper dispenser had been wrenched loose from its mounting bracket and hung crookedly down the beige partition wall by a single rusty bolt, with damp, shredded wads of paper littering the wet tile floor around an unflushed toilet. Across the beige metal stall doors and the white ceramic wall tiles, layers of vulgar black marker graffiti were scrawled over rusted partition bottoms that looked as though they hadn't seen a mop or disinfectant in months.

Holding my breath so my stomach wouldn't turn over, I used the stall as fast as humanly possible without touching a single surface I didn't have to, scrubbed my hands twice with soap at the sink beneath the half-ripped plywood mirror, and backed my SwiftChair out of that bathroom into the cold night air.

How on earth, I thought to myself as I rolled out under the bus canopy to Bay D at six-thirty-five, does a regional transit agency expect working people—let alone someone in a wheelchair—to use a transit center that looks like a condemned building?

Ten minutes later, at six-forty-five sharp, the amber headsign of the last cross-harbor bus of the night swung into Bay D:

61 CROSSROADS — EXPRESSWAYS / DOWNTOWN NORFOLK.

When the driver folded the ramp up behind my wheelchair, strapped my frame into the bay, and pulled out of Newport News toward the interstate—stopping briefly at the Hampton Transit Center at six-fifty-seven before climbing the approach trestle of the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel—I pressed my forehead against the cool glass of the window.

Below the bus windows, the black, white-capped waves of Hampton Roads harbor churned in the storm until the coach plunged downward between the concrete portal walls into the bright, white-tiled tube of the underwater tunnel beneath the Chesapeake Bay.

As the tires hummed through the tunnel beneath the ship channel and climbed back up into the rain on the Southside at Willoughby Spit, I let out a breath I felt like I had been holding since three-fifty-five in Williamsburg.

There was a mile and a half of open water and a submerged concrete tunnel between Brandon Mercer and me now. I was back on the Norfolk side of the harbor.

Saturday, November 12, 2005, 8:00 PM — CVTA Route 1 to Duffy's Lane, Portview Avenue in the Pouring Rain, & Knocking on Nate's Door

Because the six-forty-five Saturday night trip on Route 61 was an Expressways run that terminated in Downtown Norfolk instead of continuing out to Virginia Beach, the driver let me off at the Wards Corner transfer stop at Granby Street and Little Creek Road at seven-nineteen.

For forty-one minutes between seven-nineteen and eight o'clock, there was nowhere to hide from the storm.

Parked as close as I could get against the shallow brick storefront awning at the corner of Granby and Little Creek while sheets of icy November rain blew off the passing headlights and soaked through my raincoat, my jeans, and my sneakers, I tucked my canvas messenger bag inside my jacket against my chest so my birth certificate, my medication pouch, and my cell phone stayed dry, and draped my left sleeve over my right-hand joystick controller to protect the electronics from the water.

At eight o'clock on the dot, the glowing headsign of northbound CVTA Route 1—1 GRANBY ST / OCEAN VIEW—splashed to a stop at the Wards Corner curb.

Shivering so hard my teeth clicked together, I rolled up the ramp for my fifth bus ride of the afternoon and evening, riding thirteen minutes straight north up Granby Street until the operator called out my stop at eight-thirteen:

"Duffy's Lane and Ocean View Avenue!"

Rolling down the ramp into the pouring dark at Duffy's Lane, I didn't wait a second. Keeping my speed dial turned all the way up and my left hand shielding my joystick from the driving rain, I cut straight across the glistening asphalt of the shopping center parking lot and turned north onto Portview Avenue.

Half a block up Portview Avenue on my right stood the white-painted two-story courtyard building of Sea Breeze West, with the black numbers 2 3 3 mounted on the front wall and the small tree-shaded courtyard opening to the right.

And right there at the near end of the courtyard walk—the very first door on my right as I turned in from Portview Avenue—glowed the porch light of Apartment 3.

At eight-twenty, soaked to the bone and trembling from head to foot after four hours and twenty minutes across five buses in the rain, I rolled my SwiftChair right up to the wooden door, raised my freezing fist, and pounded on the wood with everything I had left:

"Please let me in!"

The End of Hell & Reclaiming Apartment 3

Part 1: A Sister's Worst Nightmare, Tiffany Forces a Choice, & Scrubbing Out the Filth

Date: 2005-11-12 at 20:20 America/New_York

Saturday, November 12, 2005, 8:20 PM — A Sister's Worst Nightmare & Five Buses from Williamsburg

"Please let me in!" a voice cried out over the roar of the cold November rain hammering the courtyard pavement outside my front door.

It was just after eight-twenty on Saturday evening inside Apartment 3—the far-end ground-floor apartment of the white-painted building at Sea Breeze West, right off Portview Avenue and West Ocean View Avenue, where our door was the very first door on the right as you turned in from Portview Avenue. When the first loud knock rattled the wooden front door, my instinct had been to ignore it. West Ocean View could be a rough neighborhood after dark, and I wasn't about to open my door to a stranger on a rainy November night.

Then I heard that voice through the rain—and my heart stopped.

I recognized my fraternal twin sister's voice instantly. Braking and pivoting my compact SwiftChair power wheelchair around the oval wooden coffee table, I rolled straight up to the wide front windows above the bright green three-cushion sofa and parted two slats of the white horizontal mini-blinds to peek out into the courtyard.

There on the concrete walk under the flickering porch light, drenched to the bone in the driving rainstorm, sat twenty-year-old Katie in her compact SwiftChair.

I unlocked and threw open the wooden front door in the corner so fast the latch banged against the drywall. Rolling her wet tires across the threshold into the living room, Katie threw both arms around my neck across our armrests and sobbed against my shoulder.

"Katie—what happened?!" I asked, holding my twin sister tight as I felt her whole body trembling through her soaking-wet jacket and jeans. Cold rainwater was dripping from her blonde hair onto the green sofa cushion as she transferred out of her wet wheelchair frame onto the couch beside me.

Katie sobbed harder, shivering uncontrollably before letting out a sharp sneeze.

"Brandon lost his mind today because he wanted me to run away with him to Canada to start a new life, and when I saw my chance at the train station, I realized I had to get out of there and start riding buses home to you!" Katie cried, clutching both of my hands as her teeth chattered. "I've been riding five city buses since four o'clock this afternoon just trying to get here from Williamsburg!"

"Tiffany, please get my sis a dry bath towel," I called out toward the hallway as Katie sneezed a second time, before turning my stunned eyes back to my twin sister. "Wait—what? Run away to Canada? Katie, what are you talking about?"

"He marched me over to the Williamsburg train station on Boundary Street with my ID and birth certificate in my bag to buy one-way rail and tunnel-bus tickets through Washington and Toledo up to Windsor, Canada so I'd never see you or Dad again," Katie sobbed, wiping her rain-soaked face with the back of her trembling hand. "He is plain off-his-rocker crazy, Nate! He locked my drive motors, switched off my joystick under the station awning, and went inside to the ticket counter thinking I wouldn't dare move—and the second the four o'clock Colonial Triangle Grey Line bus to Lee Hall pulled into the bay, I powered my joystick back on and drove straight up the ramp! He walked back out holding the train tickets right as my bus pulled onto Boundary Street!"

Katie shuddered, her icy fingers tightening around mine as she caught her breath.

"I muted my phone every time he called and transferred at Lee Hall to the 116 down to Warwick and Denbigh, where I ducked into Crown Burger for something warm to eat and a clean restroom before catching the five-thirty 107 down to Newport News Transit Center," Katie continued, her voice shaking. "I tried to use the women's restroom inside the Newport News Transit Center while waiting for the tunnel bus—and Nate, half the mirror was ripped off the wall over bare plywood and black glue blobs, the toilet paper holder was hanging by one bolt, and there was graffiti and filth everywhere. I got out of there, caught the very last six-forty-five Route 61 of the night across the bridge-tunnel to Wards Corner, waited forty minutes in the pouring rain for the eight o'clock Route 1 bus to Duffy's Lane, and rolled across the shopping center lot and half a block up Portview Avenue until I saw your door!"

I could see my sister was frightened beyond belief as Tiffany walked slowly back down the short hallway from the bathroom carrying a folded bath towel. Katie sneezed again, shivering so hard her shoulders shook.

"Do you have anything dry in your bag to change into?" I asked gently, draping the dry towel around Katie's shoulders. "I want you to get out of those sopping-wet clothes before you catch pneumonia."

"No," Katie sobbed, shaking her head. "I didn't even have time to pack a bag when I escaped—I just had to get out of there and get to you."

"Alright, here's what we'll do," I said immediately. "Take my oversized dry flannel shirt and sweatpants from my dresser so you can get out of those soaked outer clothes in the bathroom, and I've got my warm sleeping bag you can zip up in on the green sofa for tonight. There's a quarter-operated laundry room right across the courtyard in the red-brick Sea Breeze West building, and I can run your wet clothes through the washer and dryer right now so you have your own clean clothes to wear in the morning."

Standing awkwardly beside the repurposed dining table that held my desktop tower PC running Quantum OS XN Pro, Tiffany cleared her throat. "Let me go wash her clothes," Tiffany said. "You need to comfort your sister."

Once Katie had changed out of her drenched outer clothes into dry layers and wrapped the bath towel and my sleeping bag around herself on the green sofa, Tiffany picked up Katie's soggy mustard-yellow shirt and jeans, grabbed the bottle of laundry soap and our roll of quarters off the laminate kitchen counter, and stepped out the front door across the rainy courtyard toward the red-brick building's laundry room.

The moment the door closed and it was just the two of us inside the living room, Katie zipped the sleeping bag up to her collarbone, reached out, and gripped my hand with both of hers.

"I'm just so scared, Nate," Katie sobbed, her blue eyes wide as she held onto my fingers like a lifeline. "Please don't leave my side."

"I'm right here, Katie—nobody is getting past that door tonight," I promised, squeezing her hand back until a loud rumble echoed from her stomach. "You haven't eaten anything since that stop at Warwick and Denbigh before five o'clock, have you? Would you like something to eat?"

"Please," Katie whispered, wiping her eyes. "Some real food, please."

I rolled twenty feet forward to the open kitchen—feeling a wave of hot embarrassment in the pit of my stomach as my wheels navigated around the cluttered piles of unemptied trash bags, greasy fast-food wrappers, and crusty dishes that Tiffany had left littering the floor and counters—and reached into the cabinet for the only clean, sealed package I could find: a box of low-fat baked potato chips.

Rolling back to the bright green sofa, I opened the box and offered a small handful of chips to my sister. Sitting up against the arm of the green sofa inside the sleeping bag, Katie ate the chips gratefully while keeping her free hand linked with mine.

“They really thought they could force me to move to Canada and cut me off from you and Dad forever,” Katie whispered, her voice still shaking from the five-bus ordeal through the rain. “Nate, do you mind if I take a hot shower? I’ve been riding five city buses all afternoon and evening trying to get here from Williamsburg. I’m hungry, I’m exhausted, I’m scared, and I’m still freezing from the rain.”

“Come on, let’s get the hot water running for you,” I said, helping Katie out of the sleeping bag and steadying her arm as we rolled down the straight right-hand hallway past the two white bi-folding doors of the closet on the left hallway wall.

At the end of the hallway—where there was no door or doorway at all, and the space opened directly to the left into the back bedroom under the through-wall air conditioner on the back exterior wall—we turned left into the bedroom toward the bathroom entrance door, which opened inward from the bedroom into the small bathroom equipped with a sink, toilet, and a bathtub fitted with steel grab bars—though to my disgust, I first had to push aside a stack of dirty kitchen pots and pans that Tiffany had bizarrely dumped inside the tub instead of washing them. After showing Katie how to adjust the hot-water faucet and making sure a fresh dry towel was within easy reach of the grab bars, I rolled back out into the living room and closed the bathroom door so she could warm up in privacy.

By the time Katie finished her hot shower and transferred back into the warm sleeping bag on the green sofa beneath the front window blinds, Tiffany had returned from across the courtyard with Katie’s freshly dried clothes folded in her arms.

Even with the warm water taking the chill out of her bones, Katie was still too traumatized to close her eyes unless she was holding my hand. Parking my SwiftChair right beside the oval wooden coffee table at the edge of the green sofa, I held my twin sister’s hand for the next hour while she whispered every terrifying detail of how Brandon had tried to isolate and trap her in Williamsburg.

“I promise you’re safe here tonight, Katie,” I told her gently as the clock on my Quantum OS XN Pro computer monitor near the kitchen ticked toward midnight. “Since the connecting bus routes don’t run on Sundays into our neighborhood in Virginia Beach, you can rest right here all day tomorrow and we’ll figure everything out on Monday.”

Katie pulled me into a tight hug from the sofa and wept softly against my collar. “Thank you, Nate.” She let out a long, exhausted yawn, though her eyes still darted nervously toward the front window blinds.

“We really need to get some sleep—it’s almost midnight, and after five buses from Williamsburg, you especially need your rest,” I said softly, squeezing her hand one last time before rolling down the hallway toward the open-doorway back bedroom where the through-wall box air conditioner hummed opposite its wall-mounted temperature switch. “Tomorrow morning, we’ll help you get everything sorted out.”

Sunday, November 13, 2005, 8:15 AM — Dry Cereal Without Milk & Tiffany Forces a Choice in the Open Kitchen

Morning barely filtered through the white horizontal mini-blinds at the front of the apartment when the sound of muffled crying from the living room jolted me awake.

Transferring out of the queen bed into my SwiftChair in seconds, I rolled straight out of the doorless back bedroom down the hallway to the green sofa.

Katie was sitting upright inside the sleeping bag with both hands pressed over her face, sobbing uncontrollably.

“I had a nightmare,” Katie cried as I rolled right up to the sofa cushion and wrapped both arms around her shoulders. “They were forcing me across the border into Canada and locking me in a room where I couldn’t call you or Dad. It felt so real, Nate!”

“You’re right here in Ocean View with me—Brandon can never touch you again,” I said, holding my twin sister close until her breathing steadied. “Let me make you some breakfast. How does cereal sound?”

“Please,” Katie said, wiping her cheeks. “And could you hand me my clothes from the chair? I want to get dressed.”

I handed Katie her clean mustard-yellow short-sleeve T-shirt and blue jeans from the laundry pile, giving her privacy while she got dressed and transferred into her SwiftChair, while I rolled straight ahead into the open kitchen under the hanging amber cone pull-chain lamp—along the narrow lane of linoleum I had cleared earlier that morning by shoving the worst floor piles into black garbage bags just so both of our wheelchairs could maneuver—and took two bowls and a box of toasted oat cereal down from the counter.

When I rolled back to the oval wooden coffee table and set the two bowls down in front of us, Katie looked down at the dry cereal and blinked in surprise.

“No milk?” Katie asked.

“Tiffany claims she’s lactose intolerant,” I explained, unable to hide the weary frustration in my voice as I glanced back toward the black top-freezer refrigerator. “She says even the sight of a jug of milk in the refrigerator makes her sick, so she won’t let me keep any in the apartment.”

Katie ate her dry cereal grudgingly without saying another word about the milk—she knew me well enough to see that complaining to me about Tiffany’s rules right now was barking up the wrong tree—until she set her spoon down and looked quietly into my eyes.

“Nate,” Katie said in a low voice, “sometime today, when it’s just you and me, I want to talk.”

“What is it?” I asked.

“I want to talk to you—just you,” Katie repeated evenly, glancing toward the hallway. “Ask me again when it’s just you and me.”

Before I could answer, footsteps shuffled down the hallway from the back bedroom.

Wearing her black-rimmed rectangular glasses, her mint-green short-sleeve graphic T-shirt, and her charcoal-gray pants, Tiffany stepped out of the hallway into the open kitchen right in front of the slate-blue four-burner stove and the black top-freezer refrigerator. Stopping beneath the hanging amber cone pull-chain lamp and the olive-green upper cabinets, she folded her arms, glared at Katie and me sitting together by the oval coffee table, and spoke in a loud, accusatory sneer.

“You know, you seem to be cuddling with Katie a whole lot more than me,” Tiffany snapped. “Do you not love me?”

Beside me, Katie looked at Tiffany with pure disgust. To my twin sister, the very idea that anyone would try to force an ultimatum between a loyal twin sibling and a romantic partner—after Katie had just escaped an abusive nightmare in Williamsburg the night before—was repellent.

“Uh, excuse me?” Katie spoke up, rolling her SwiftChair two feet forward toward the open kitchen.

I knew the two of them had disliked each other ever since Tiffany ruined our brother-and-sister weekend fourteen months ago, but one rule had been carved into my soul since the day we were born: no one insults my twin sister. Watching Tiffany glare at Katie felt like that awful day in Newport News when Tiffany had disrespected our developmentally disabled cousin Chelsea all over again.

“Of course I love you, Tiffany,” I replied, rolling my chair up beside Katie’s in front of the stove, “but why can’t you accept that I love my twin sister too?”

“You really need to think about what you just said, Tiffany,” Katie said firmly, looking straight up at her. “I’m his twin sister; you’re his girlfriend. There is zero reason on earth why you should be getting jealous of me hugging my brother after what I went through yesterday.”

Tiffany’s face contorted with fury behind her black-rimmed glasses, and she lunged half a step forward in front of the slate-blue stove, screaming straight into Katie’s face:

“Don’t you talk to me like that!”

Right then and there, standing in front of that filthy kitchen counter between the slate-blue stove and the black refrigerator, every warning Katie had given me outside in the Sea Breeze West courtyard fourteen months ago clicked into focus. My girlfriend hated my twin sister, disrespected my family, and wanted me isolated in the dark—and I was never going to choose anyone who treated Katie like that.

Katie and I sat side by side in our wheelchairs, staring daggers straight back at Tiffany without giving an inch.

Seeing the look in my eyes—realizing for the first time that her temper tantrum wasn’t going to make me apologize or push Katie away—Tiffany looked at me with deep loathing and rage.

“Forget it!” Tiffany shrieked, grabbing her purse and jacket off the corner of the repurposed dining-table computer desk. “You don’t love me! Good riddance!”

“No, he doesn’t love you!” Katie snarled, wheeling forward toward the front door as Tiffany yanked it open. “Go on! Get out of here! Stay away from me, and stay away from my brother! Don’t ever come back!”

The wooden front door slammed so hard the white horizontal mini-blinds rattled against the glass.

In the sudden, ringing silence of Apartment 3, Katie turned her wheelchair toward me and spoke gently.

“You’re probably going to hate me for saying this right now, Nate, but I’m glad she’s leaving you,” Katie said softly. “If your girlfriend can’t even accept you hugging and comforting your own twin sister, then you don’t need her in your life.”

All at once, the dam inside my chest broke. Even though Katie was still raw and traumatized from her escape from Williamsburg, I started crying right alongside her as the reality registered in my twenty-year-old mind: my girlfriend had just dumped me and walked out the door.

Katie immediately rolled flush against my chair, pulled me into a deep, grounding hug across our armrests, and held the back of my head against her shoulder.

“Would you like me to stay here with you for now?” Katie whispered as she wiped the tears from my eyes and I wiped hers. “This way you won’t have to be alone.”

“Please—would you, Katie?” I asked, my voice shaking.

Katie knew how much I hated being alone. Holding both of my hands, she offered a brave little smile. “Want me to make us some lunch?”

Rolling four feet forward into the open kitchen, Katie opened the black top-freezer refrigerator and the olive-green base cabinets, then grimaced as she surveyed the crusty counters, the overflowing trash bags, and the sour smell hanging in the air.

“You know, Nate, she really is a pig,” Katie said bluntly, closing the empty refrigerator door. “I still have my paycheck money in my wallet. How about we roll down to the shopping center and grab a real hot lunch, and pick up some basic groceries while we’re out?”

“Alright, Katie,” I nodded, wiping my face. “And while we’re at the grocery store in the shopping center, you can buy a Norfolk CVTA bus pass right at the front customer-service desk.”

“Do they sell a monthly pass?” Katie asked as we rolled out the front door into the sunny Sunday courtyard.

“Fifty dollars for thirty days,” I told her as we wheeled down the sidewalk along West Ocean View Avenue. “It’s a thirty-day magnetic card, and the thirty-day clock doesn’t start ticking until the first time you swipe it in the farebox on a CVTA bus.”

Sunday, November 13, 2005, 1:00 PM — Crown Burger & The Heavy-Duty Deep Clean of Apartment 3

Twenty minutes later, after picking up Katie's new thirty-day bus pass at the grocery store counter, the two of us sat across from each other at an accessible table inside the Ocean View Crown Burger right down West Ocean View Avenue with hot burgers, crispy fries, and two tall cups of soda in front of us.

Now that we were out of the apartment and away from the stench of Tiffany's mess, Katie leaned forward across the table and looked me straight in the eyes.

"Now that she's not around, Nate, I'm going to be blunt and I'm going to be completely honest with you," Katie said evenly. "She was treating you like trash—and I know this isn't polite to say when you just broke up, but I wanted you to leave her."

I opened my mouth to say something, only for Katie to hold up her hand and continue.

"I know your bedroom—and mine too—have gotten a little messy with computer books or laundry at times when we were teenagers," Katie said, her voice tight with protective anger. "But never in our entire lives have I seen you live in filth like what's back in that apartment right now. That apartment isn't just cluttered, Nate—it is trashed. It's overstuffed with rotting garbage bags that haven't been taken to the outdoor trash bin in weeks, crusty takeout containers stacked on every surface, and filthy dishes everywhere. Tiffany is a pig, and I don't want you associating with her ever again."

Again I tried to speak, and Katie immediately reached across the burger wrappers to take my hand so I wouldn't misunderstand her.

"It's not you I'm mad at, Nate," Katie said softly. "I know how your mind works when somebody bullies you and shuts you down until you freeze up. I'm mad at her for treating my twin brother like trash. But now it's over and done with. Welcome back to the light."

Those four words—welcome back to the light—brought fresh tears welling into my eyes. With Tiffany officially my ex, the heavy, suffocating fog that had trapped me inside Apartment 3 for the last year was finally lifting, and I could see clearly that every word my twin sister was speaking was the truth.

"You're saying…" I started, my voice choking up.

"Truth is," Katie whispered, her own blue eyes tearing up across the table, "I never approved of Tiffany. Remember that weekend last September when I took the Route 1 bus here because I wanted a brother-and-sister weekend with you and just you?"

"Yeah," I answered quietly, remembering how I had snapped at Katie outside in the courtyard before she swore her Speak now or forever hold your peace vow.

"That's the exact day she lost every shred of my trust—when she threw a fit and insisted she wouldn't allow the two of us to spend a weekend together," Katie said. "I wanted a brother-and-sister weekend with my twin. I wasn't going to bring an ex-boyfriend between us, and I never wanted a girlfriend coming between us either."

When we rolled back down West Ocean View Avenue and returned to Apartment 3, the sight of the trashed combination living room and kitchen hit me like a physical blow. Transferring onto the bright green sofa beneath the front window blinds, I felt so emotionally drained that Katie transferred onto the cushion beside me, opened her arms, and let me rest my head in her lap while she wrapped her arms around my shoulders.

“Katie,” I whispered, staring at the worn carpet by the oval coffee table, “do you promise not to tell anyone what I’m getting ready to tell you?”

“Twin’s promise,” Katie said softly, curling her arms more tightly around me to let me know I was completely safe.

Resting my cheek against my sister’s knee, I finally let out everything I had kept locked inside my chest for a year—how Tiffany and Tiffany’s manipulative mother had coerced and guilt-tripped me from the very beginning, using affection as a weapon to separate me from my family, and how toward the end Tiffany’s mother had turned on me with open hatred while Tiffany let the apartment rot around us.

After holding me in silence for a long time and letting me cry until my chest stopped aching, Katie made her decision.

“I want to live with you, Nate,” Katie said, looking down into my eyes with steady, unbreakable resolve.

My heart leaped with relief, and I loved what she said next even more.

“We’re going to get this apartment into decent, spotless condition until your lease is up, I promise you,” Katie said, pulling me upright into a fierce hug. “We’re going to pack every single one of Tiffany’s things into separate bags by the door, and we’re going to make Apartment 3 a real home for you and me—a place that both of us can be proud to show our friends and Dad. First question: what bus takes us from here to the Community College of Hampton Roads in Virginia Beach?”

“Thank you, Katie,” I said, wiping my eyes with a real smile breaking across my face. “Tomorrow morning, we can catch the Route 1 bus that leaves Ocean View Station at thirteen minutes past the hour—it’s about a ninety-minute ride down to the Virginia Beach campus. Or if you want a shorter commute, maybe you could register for classes at the Norfolk campus downtown? That’s only forty-five minutes on the Downtown 1 or about an hour on the Downtown 3.”

“All my friends are at the Virginia Beach campus,” Katie replied without hesitation.

“Alright,” I smiled. “Tomorrow morning, I’ll take you on the bus down to the Beach campus and we’ll register together.”

“Thanks, Nate,” Katie said, transferring back into her SwiftChair and rolling her sleeves up past her elbows. “Now, let’s get this apartment cleaned up. Priority one: where are the heavy-duty trash bags? Anything that’s garbage, throw it straight in. Anything that belongs to Tiffany, put it in a separate bag by the front door in case she and her mother come back to collect her things. You’re going to hate me for how hard I push us today, because this filth won’t be cleaned in five minutes—but I promise you, it will get done, and we are going to do it together.”

The truth was, the deeper we dug into the apartment, the more mortified I felt. It wasn't just untidy; it was an overwhelming disaster of uncollected trash and grime that needed heavy-duty scrubbing from floor to baseboards. To keep our spirits up, Katie rolled over to the large repurposed dining table on the left side between the living room and the kitchen, woke up my seventeen-inch off-white CRT monitor and my 2004 desktop tower PC—which ran Quantum OS XN Pro and still sported the salvaged off-white three-and-a-half-inch floppy drive, CD-ROM drive, and CD-RW drive from our older desktop computer—and queued up a playlist of our favorite upbeat nineteen-eighties synth-rock and pop tracks through the desktop speakers.

For the next two hours, working side by side from our compact power wheelchairs, Katie tackled the overflowing trash around the green sofa, the oval coffee table, and the open kitchen counters while I bagged up the piles of garbage choking the back hallway and the open-doorway bedroom. Sweat poured down my forehead as I tied off bag after heavy black bag, my gag reflex kicking in half a dozen times whenever we uncovered week-old takeout containers festering at the bottom of a pile.

"Nate, come help me clean the bathroom!" Katie called out from the short hallway on the far right.

"Coming," I called back, rolling out of the doorless bedroom and turning left toward the inward-opening bathroom door.

Katie was sitting in her wheelchair just inside the bathroom doorway, staring in disbelief at the bathtub beneath the steel grab bars.

"Why on earth are all of these kitchen pots and pans stacked inside the bathtub?!" Katie demanded.

"Ask Tiffany that," I groaned in pure disgust. "Whenever she didn't feel like washing a pot in the kitchen sink, she just dumped it in the tub so she wouldn't have to look at it."

"Here is what we're going to do," Katie said, pinching the bridge of her nose. "Let's haul every single one of those pots and pans out of the bathtub and stack them by the kitchen sink for now. Then we're going to scrub this entire bathroom down together with heavy-duty cleaner from the grab bars to the tile floor. Once the bathroom is sparkling, I'll help you go through the pots and pans to see which ones are even salvageable and which ones go straight in the outdoor trash bin."

"Alright, Katie," I said.

Both of us gagged out loud as we lifted the crusted, foul-smelling pots and pans out of the bathtub onto a plastic tray on our laps and ferried them back to the open kitchen.

"That old bat was absolutely disgusting," Katie shuddered, wiping her hands with a soapy paper towel. "Let's haul all of these tied-up trash bags out to the outdoor trash bins behind the complex first so we can breathe, and then we'll scrub the bathroom together."

Rolling back into the living room and looking around at the newly cleared carpet between the bright green sofa, the oval wooden coffee table, and the Quantum OS XN Pro computer table, I realized just how deeply Katie cared about me. Tears stung my eyes again, and I braked my chair beside hers and pulled her into a grateful hug.

“Thank you, Katie,” I sobbed quietly against her shoulder. “The place is starting to look so much better already.”

“She was a pig, Nate, and you deserve to live in a clean, decent home where you feel comfortable having family and friends over,” Katie said warmly, hugging me back before tapping my armrest with a grin. “Now let’s keep rolling and finish the job, because this place is nowhere near done yet!”

Side by side, balancing the heavy black garbage bags across our footplates and armrests, we rolled out the front door of Apartment 3, wheeled down the courtyard walk past the white two-rail fence, and heaved bag after bag into the steel outdoor trash bins behind the complex.

“Do we have any air fresheners inside?” Katie asked as we rolled back through the courtyard.

“I don’t think so,” I admitted.

By late Sunday afternoon—after hours of scrubbing the grab-bar bathtub, the bathroom sink and toilet, the olive-green kitchen cabinets, the speckled laminate prep counters, the slate-blue stove, and the inside of the black top-freezer refrigerator—Apartment 3 finally looked and smelled like a human home again.

“I actually feel like we could have company over now,” Katie said with a tired, proud sigh as she surveyed the clean living room and kitchen. “We just need to air the rooms out and pick up some air fresheners to clear out the last of that stale smell. How about we roll straight down to the shopping center first to grab a nice dinner and some plug-in air fresheners? Then when we get back home, we can take hot showers and relax for the rest of the night.”

“Yeah—after hauling all those bags to the outdoor trash bin, I’m wiped out,” I smiled. “Food first.”

An hour later, after celebrating with a hot dinner at the shopping center and plugging fresh linen-scented air fresheners into the outlets by the green sofa and the open kitchen, Katie and I braked our compact SwiftChairs side by side in front of the bright green three-cushion sofa beneath the white horizontal window mini-blinds, our footrests angled two inches apart and each of us holding a cold can of ginger ale.

Outside the front windows, the November night was dark and quiet, and the open top sash was letting a crisp salt breeze off the Chesapeake Bay clear the last traces of stale grease out of Apartment 3. My arms ached from hours of scrubbing countertops and baseboards, and dark circles still lingered under Katie’s eyes from her four-hour-and-twenty-minute journey across five buses in the rain the night before, yet the apartment was quieter and more peaceful than it had been in fourteen months.

Katie took a slow sip from her ginger ale can, looked around at the clean walls and the wide, unobstructed turning space between the sofa and the kitchen doorway, and then looked over at me. All of a sudden, fresh tears welled up in her blue eyes and spilled down her cheeks.

“Katie?” I asked softly, rolling half a foot closer and reaching across our armrests to take her hand. “What’s wrong?”

“I’m just thinking about everything that happened to the two of us over the last fourteen months,” Katie wept, gripping my fingers tightly with hers as the tears streamed down her face. “Do you remember what everybody kept telling us when our lease in West Ghent was coming up last summer? How twenty-year-olds aren’t supposed to just live with their twin forever? How we needed to get out there, date normal people, and have our own separate lives?”

I looked down at the condensation on my ginger ale can, thinking of fourteen months of Tiffany piling dirty pans in the bathtub, blocking my turning radius in the hallway with her junk, and slamming doors whenever Katie’s name flashed on my phone.

“Yeah,” I said softly. “I remember.”

“Look at how badly both of us got hurt the first time in our lives we ever let people pull us apart, Nate,” Katie said, her voice steady through her tears in the quiet room. “Brandon used to grab the push-handles on the back of my chair whenever he didn’t like how fast I was rolling or who I was talking to. He made me feel like needing a wheelchair and taking daily medicine meant I owed him obedience for putting up with me, and yesterday he tried to drag me to Canada where I’d never see you or Dad again. And Tiffany and her mother had you trapped right here in the dark, bullying you and treating you like garbage. Last night, when I was sitting in the pouring rain at Wards Corner waiting for the Route 1 bus to bring me here, I realized the only people on this earth who have never once made us feel broken are you, me, and Dad.”

My throat tightened as I watched the tears glistening on my twin sister’s cheeks. All afternoon she had been the fierce, unstoppable one pushing us through bag after bag of rotting trash, and only now that the apartment was finally clean and quiet did the full weight of what both of us had survived come crashing down on her heart.

“I’m so sorry I didn’t listen to you in the courtyard last September, Katie,” I whispered, my own eyes stinging as I squeezed her hand. “And I’m so sorry I wasn’t up there in Williamsburg to protect you from Brandon.”

“We’re together now—that’s what matters,” Katie cried softly, looking straight into my eyes as she held my hand like an unbreakable vow between our two chairs. “I’m done letting outsiders into our lives, Nate. I don’t ever want a boyfriend or a husband, and I don’t ever want another person moving into our home and trying to split us up or run our lives. Aside from Dad, nobody else gets inside our walls ever again. When you asked me this morning if I wanted to move in here and live with you, I didn’t mean just until our next lease is up. I promise you right here and right now: we will never separate ever again.”

“Neither did I—and never again,” I promised her back, my throat tightening as I squeezed her fingers. “Dad is the only other person who ever gets a key to our front door. When it comes to our lives, it’s you and me from here on out, Katie. Fifty-fifty on every lease, every house we ever buy, every line of code we write, and every bus we ride—for the rest of our lives.”

Katie smiled through her tears, the tension of the last fourteen months finally melting out of her shoulders as she tapped her ginger ale can gently against mine.

“Just you and me, fifty-fifty for life—plus Dad,” Katie whispered. “Deal.”

When we rolled down the hallway into our freshly scrubbed bathroom to wash off six hours of heavy-duty cleaning, there wasn't a shred of awkwardness or a need to look away between the two of us. We had come into the world at the same hour, lost the use of our legs on the exact same Friday afternoon in eleventh grade at Northwood High School, and spent years helping each other through transfers and muscle spasms when nobody else understood how our bodies worked. Neither of us wanted an outside home-health aide or an able-bodied partner standing over us ever again, and looking at each other had never felt any different than looking in a mirror.

While I leaned forward from my SwiftChair to turn the shower valve all the way to hot until warm steam billowed across the clean bathroom tile, we peeled off our sweat-damp shirts, jeans, and underclothes right beside our chairs. I transferred onto the wide padded bath bench beneath the steel grab bars first, then reached out both hands to brace Katie's hips and ribs as she slid across from her seat cushion right against my side under the steaming spray.

As the hot water poured over both of our shoulders, Katie let out a long, relieved sigh and leaned her weight sideways against my bare shoulder while I held her steady with one arm around her waist and used the handheld showerhead with the other to warm our tired legs and feet. When Brandon had touched her in Williamsburg, he had grabbed her from above over her wheelchair backrest like a warden pinning a prisoner down; sitting pressed side by side on the transfer bench washing the last grime of the weekend off each other's skin while Katie lathered my back and I washed her hair, neither of us had to hide an inch of ourselves.

Twenty minutes later, dried off with clean bath towels while the bathroom heater ticked warmly behind us, we rolled out of the bathroom into the doorless back bedroom and stopped side by side in front of the queen bed.

We took one look at that caving-in mattress in the far corner—the bed where Tiffany and I had slept during the worst year of my life—and both of us felt the exact same wave of revulsion at the exact same second.

"I don't want to sleep where you and Tiffany slept, Nate," Katie said flatly, wrinkling her nose at the sagging center of the mattress. "Even if we buy brand-new sheets at the mall tomorrow so the bedroom doesn't look like an eyesore, I do not want either of us lying on that bed tonight."

"Me neither," I agreed immediately. "Looking at that mattress just makes my skin crawl."

Katie sat quiet for a moment in her wheelchair, then turned her head toward the straight carpeted hallway, where the standard-width white bi-folding doors of the hallway closet stood open on the left wall above the freshly vacuumed carpet we had cleared out that afternoon. All at once, a mischievous, brilliant spark lit up her blue eyes.

"I have a crazy idea," Katie said.

"What's your crazy idea?" I asked.

“What if we do just like we did back in Apartment A6 on Greenway Court, and take our sleeping bag and the pillows I was using on the green sofa last night and move them right onto the carpeted floor inside the hallway closet so the two of us can make the closet our bedroom again?” Katie asked.

The moment she said it, my whole chest relaxed. Back when we lived together in Apartment A6 on Greenway Court, our full-sized bed out in the main studio had rarely ever been used because both of us had much preferred sleeping cuddled up together inside our single shared sleeping bag in the confined space of the square closet. Because both of us are autistic, vast open rooms with drafty windows and streetlamp glare leaking through mini-blinds left our nervous systems on high alert —whereas a small, enclosed, dark space where we could tuck in together inside a single shared sleeping bag and hold each other close made us feel completely secure.

“Katie, that isn’t crazy at all—that’s genius,” I smiled.

Rolling back out to the bright green sofa in the living room, we gathered up the warm navy-blue sleeping bag and the two pillows Katie had used the night before, carried them across our laps down the carpeted hallway, and spread the sleeping bag and pillows neatly across the vacuumed carpet on the floor of the hallway closet.

When we transferred down out of our compact SwiftChairs onto the soft carpet at the closet threshold, we didn’t bother putting pajama shirts or shorts back on. Because full-time wheelchair users with lower-extremity neuromuscular paralysis have impaired circulation below the waist, tight waistbands and tangled fabric only trapped the chill against our legs—and the fastest, most natural way to keep our core temperature steady and calm our muscle spasms all night was sharing our body heat skin-to-skin inside the sleeping bag.

Climbing into the single navy-blue sleeping bag together and zipping the quilted fabric up to our shoulders, I reached up to pull the two white bi-folding closet doors completely closed until they latched, and Katie reached up to click off the overhead closet light.

Instant, velvet darkness wrapped around us from wall to wall.

“I missed sleeping right beside my twin sister,” I whispered inside the snug, pitch-dark quiet of the enclosed closet as a single tear of relief slipped from the corner of my eye onto the pillow.

Turning on our sides facing each other inside the shared sleeping bag, Katie curled her bare front tight against my chest and tucked her cool feet between my shins while I wrapped both arms securely around her bare back—holding her flush against my heartbeat at the exact same level, where nobody was hovering over a chair or caging either of us in. Within minutes, our shared warmth soaked into our legs, calming every last tremor of fight-or-flight anxiety in our autistic minds.

“You’re still shaken up from everything today, aren’t you?” Katie asked comfortingly, resting a gentle hand against my cheek as I laid my head against her shoulder.

Even in the dark, she knew me by heart.

“You just want to hold me, don’t you?” Katie whispered, wrapping both arms securely around my shoulders inside the shared sleeping bag so I wouldn’t burst into tears again. “It’s alright, Nate. Both of us went through hell this weekend, and you’re emotionally exhausted. We had a long afternoon scrubbing this whole apartment back to life—so tonight, inside our own quiet little sanctuary, just hold onto me and get some sleep.”

She leaned over and gently kissed my forehead goodnight, just like we used to do when we were kids on Delaney Street, and bundled together inside that dark, enclosed hallway closet, both of us fell fast asleep feeling completely secure.

Part 2: The 8:13 AM Bus to CCHR, All-New Queen Bedding, Dad’s Pickup Truck, & The Hallway Closet Sanctuary

Date: 2005-11-14 at 07:30 America/New_York

Monday, November 14, 2005, 7:30 AM — Real Milk in the Cereal Bowls & The 8:13 AM Route 1 Bus to CCHR

“Good morning, sleepyhead—look what’s in the bowls today,” Katie called out cheerfully from the open kitchen as I rolled my compact SwiftChair out of the doorless back bedroom down the short right-hand hallway.

Under the hanging amber cone pull-chain lamp, Katie was pouring cold, fresh white milk from a half-gallon carton we had picked up the night before into two bowls of toasted oat cereal on the speckled laminate counter.

“Real milk!” I grinned, rolling up to the oval wooden coffee table in front of the bright green sofa as Katie carried both bowls over on a tray.

“And even better news,” Katie said, setting my bowl down in front of me before parking her SwiftChair beside mine. “I called Dad at his house in Virginia Beach twenty minutes ago. He knows that you and I are living together here in Apartment 3 now, he knows Tiffany left you in that disgusting mess and that the two of us spent all day Sunday scrubbing the apartment clean, and he’s bringing his pickup truck over this afternoon to help us move my dresser and clothes in! Now, what time did you say the bus to Virginia Beach leaves?”

“Thirteen minutes past the hour,” I answered after giving my twin sister a grateful thank-you hug across our armrests. “We just roll right up West Ocean View Avenue to Ocean View Station by the Burger Arch. It’s a ninety-minute ride down to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus—and we just have to remember that the last bus leaving CCHR to bring us back here is at 5:45 PM, because buses in Virginia Beach stop running around dinnertime for some reason.”

“Today I want to get both of us registered for our CCHR classes so we’re right back on track,” Katie said, taking a spoonful of cereal with real milk. “And while we’re in Virginia Beach, I want to take the bus over to Chesapeake Bay Mall and buy brand-new bedding for the queen mattress—sheets, comforter, pillows, everything—because I don’t trust a single thread that’s currently on that bed. Which bus routes go from CCHR toward Dad’s house off Military Highway and Indian River Road?”

“Any of the routes hubbing out of CCHR—Routes 12, 25, 26, 29, 33, and 36,” I told her.

“Perfect,” Katie said. “I told Dad we’d meet him with his pickup truck after we pick up the new bedding at the mall, ride over to his house to load up my basics—my laptop, my dresser, my clothes, my clock radio, and my television and DVD player—and bring them straight back here to Ocean View.”

As soon as we finished eating breakfast, Katie picked up both of our empty cereal bowls and our spoons from the oval coffee table and rolled straight back to the kitchen sink.

“From now on, Nate, we wash as we go,” Katie declared, turning on the hot tap and scrubbing both bowls with dish soap right from her wheelchair. “This way there are never any smelly, crusted dishes lying around the sink or the bathtub ever again.”

Glancing at her wristwatch as she set the two sparkling bowls into the drying rack, Katie dried her hands on a clean dish towel. “I want us on that 8:13 AM Route 1 bus. If we catch the 8:13 at the Burger Arch, what time will we roll into CCHR?”

“Right around 9:45 AM—it’s an hour and thirty minutes end to end,” I said, watching in admiration as she finished wiping down the sink rim. “You really meant it about doing the dishes immediately!”

“We used two cereal bowls for breakfast, and washing them the second we finish takes sixty seconds,” Katie smiled, unlocking her brakes and rolling toward the front door by the white mini-blinds. “I want both of us to feel proud of how neat we’re keeping our apartment. Come on—let’s catch the 8:13!”

Ten minutes later, at the Ocean View Station bus loop near the Burger Arch, the blue-and-silver CVTA Route 1 bus knelt at the curb and lowered its hydraulic front ramp. Rolling up the ramp one behind the other, Katie swiped her brand-new fifty-dollar thirty-day magnetic bus pass in the farebox right after mine, and the driver secured both of our compact SwiftChairs into the front wheelchair bays behind the yellow line.

Even after four years in our powerchairs, the cool damp November air had left a dull ache in my lower legs, and it felt wonderful to sit securely side by side with my twin sister as the bus rolled south down Granby Street and turned east toward Virginia Beach.

“Welcome to our oh-so-wonderful regional transit patchwork,” I joked to Katie as the Route 1 crossed the municipal line out of Norfolk into Virginia Beach. “Back in Norfolk on Route 1, no complaints at all—you can catch a bus late into the night. Cross the city line into Virginia Beach, though, and the whole bus system shuts down at dinner like nobody with a job or a wheelchair ever needs to go anywhere after six o’clock.”

“Wait until we start writing about that online,” Katie murmured, her blue eyes narrowing thoughtfully as she looked out the bus window at the narrow road shoulders without sidewalks.

At 9:45 AM sharp, the Route 1 pulled into the transit loop at the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus. Rolling into the student services building together, we got in line at the registrar's counter while I pulled out my flip phone and called Dad to let him know we had made it safely down from Ocean View on the bus and were registering for classes.

At the counter, Katie and I came up with a registration plan that gave us the best of both worlds: we signed up to take United States History together in the exact same lecture section—which knocked out our required history credits side by side—while letting each of us pursue our favorite subjects in our other classes, with me diving into computer programming and software architecture while Katie registered for early European literature.

At 11:45 AM, with our printed spring class schedules tucked safely into Katie's backpack, we rolled out to the CCHR bus loop and boarded CVTA Route 29 up to Chesapeake Bay Mall.

"Priority one," Katie announced as we wheeled off the Route 29 ramp into the mall entrance: "I'm starving! Let's grab lunch at the food court first, and then we're heading downstairs to the department store for bedding. I'm sorry, Nate, but what Tiffany left on that bed was disgusting, and I want all-new everything so you never have to be reminded of her in our bedroom again."

After eating lunch together upstairs, we took the mall elevator down to the lower level and rolled into the home-goods department among the rows of packaged sheet sets and comforters.

"Can I help you two find anything today?" a friendly sales clerk asked, stepping over to our wheelchairs.

"Yes, please!" Katie replied brightly. "I'm moving in with my twin brother to help him get back on his feet, and I'm looking for a complete, high-quality bedding set for a queen-sized mattress. All we're keeping is the mattress itself—we're starting completely over from scratch, so I want new fitted and flat sheets, a warm comforter, new pillows, and new pillowcases."

Rolling down the aisle together, Katie and I picked out a soft navy-and-slate-blue queen comforter set with crisp cotton sheets and four plush pillows that both of us loved. After Katie paid for the giant zippered bedding bags at the register, my phone buzzed with a text from Dad: he was waiting right outside the mall doors in his pickup truck.

Monday, November 14, 2005, 2:30 PM — Dad's Pickup Truck, A Real Grocery Run, The Confrontation With Tiffany's Van, & The Hallway Closet Sanctuary

Rolling out through the automatic glass doors into the Chesapeake Bay Mall pickup zone, we spotted our forty-seven-year-old dad standing beside the open tailgate of his pickup truck with the folding aluminum loading ramps already set in place.

"There are my two favorite college students!" Dad said warmly, hugging Katie and me tightly before helping us load the new queen bedding bags, secure our two compact SwiftChairs in the bed of the pickup truck, and settle into the back seat of the extended cab behind him.

The ride down to Dad's single-story brick ranch off Military Highway and Indian River Road was quiet and easy, and once we arrived, Dad loaded Katie's clothes, her wooden dresser, her television and DVD player, her digital clock radio, her laptop, and the other essentials she felt she needed into the bed of his pickup truck. Climbing back into the cab—with Dad up front in the driver's seat and Katie and me side by side in the back—we spent the drive back across the city line into Norfolk explaining everything that had happened over the last forty-eight hours: from Brandon Mercer trying to force Katie to run away with him to Canada and Katie's five-bus escape from Williamsburg through the Saturday night rainstorm, to Tiffany screaming at us in front of the stove and dumping me on Sunday morning, to Katie offering to move in and live with me after we spent all day Sunday scrubbing out the filth.

Listening in the driver's seat, Dad's knuckles turned white on the steering wheel, a deep, protective fury settling behind his glasses at what both Brandon and Tiffany had put his nineteen-year-old twins through.

When we arrived in Ocean View and Dad backed his pickup truck up to the white two-rail fence at Sea Breeze West, we quickly unloaded my sister's things into the courtyard of Apartment 3. Looking into the newly scrubbed open kitchen, Dad turned to the two of us.

"Do you two need to go grocery shopping while I have the truck here?" Dad asked.

"That might not be a bad idea," Katie said immediately. "She did a horrible job keeping food in the apartment, and I didn't trust any of the food that was left. She was an absolute slob, so I threw everything out into the outdoor trash bin yesterday."

Ten minutes later, Dad pulled into the parking lot of the neighborhood grocery store down West Ocean View Avenue, set the folding ramps against his tailgate so we could roll our two compact SwiftChairs down onto the pavement, and walked right inside through the automatic glass doors with us. In the front vestibule, Dad pulled a full-sized metal shopping cart out of the rack to push right alongside our wheelchairs so that Katie and I could keep both hands free to steer and pick out every item ourselves.

Katie was lovingly stubborn about taking charge of the grocery run for the two of us.

"I want to buy food that we like," Katie said firmly as our wheelchairs rolled side by side toward the bright produce section with Dad pushing the cart half a step behind us. "Yes, she bought food, but she didn't take any of your input. You know that as well as I do."

She thought about it for a moment as her tires hummed across the polished floor, then added, "And I don't believe she was really allergic to milk, since she ate ice cream."

"Chocolate ice cream," I said.

"Point being, if she could eat dairy, she could have milk," Katie said as we rolled up to the misted produce tables. Reaching out from her wheelchair, she inspected a pyramid of crisp red apples, bagged half a dozen firm ones, and handed the bag up to Dad to set into the shopping cart. "Here—you haven't had apples in a while."

"What else do you want to get?" I asked.

Katie pulled out her flip phone, flipped it open, and angled the screen toward my eyes. “I made a list of what we need. I want to completely restock the apartment with you-and-me food.”

Rolling slowly along the produce tables together while Dad followed with the cart, Katie and I picked out a bunch of ripe yellow bananas for morning snacks before our bus rides to CCHR, a head of crisp green leaf lettuce and two vine-ripened tomatoes for sandwiches, a bag of baby carrots, and a five-pound mesh sack of russet potatoes that I lifted off the lower wooden bin and passed back to Dad. Each time we chose something, Dad took it from our hands with an approving nod and arranged it neatly in the basket of the cart so nothing bruised.

From produce, we rolled down the bakery aisle, where Katie reached out to grab a soft loaf of whole-wheat sandwich bread and handed it to Dad, before steering us toward the refrigerated packaged meat wall.

“Lunch meats for us, of course,” Katie said, scanning the pegs of plastic-sealed packages.

“Can we get the meat from the deli instead?” I asked.

“Sure,” Katie said, pivoting her SwiftChair around while Dad turned the shopping cart to follow us back toward the lighted glass deli counter. “What kind of meat would you like?”

“Just some ham will do,” I said as our two wheelchairs rolled up to the deli case.

“Sure, I’ll get some ham. Half a pound sound good?” Katie asked me.

“Sure,” I replied.

Looking up at the clerk behind the glass counter, Katie smiled politely. “I’ll take a half pound of thinly sliced honey ham, please.”

When the clerk handed down the warm, white-paper-wrapped parcel sealed with its printed weight label, Katie checked it with a satisfied nod and passed it back to Dad, who laid it carefully beside the bread in the top basket of the cart.

“We need to get a few more items on my list,” Katie said, glancing down at her phone screen again. “Condiments, of course, to make sandwiches, and breakfast food. Milk and cereal, of course, but I also want to get other breakfast supplies in case we want pancakes or eggs or whatnot.”

“Alright. What about dinner?” I asked.

“That’s why we’re getting meat,” Katie said as we rolled back along the fresh meat case and she eyeballed the cuts arranged on the chilled display trays. “I don’t want to get too much since it will be just you and me.”

Working together from our chairs, Katie and I picked out a smaller two-person package of lean ground beef for skillet pasta nights and a pair of boneless chicken breasts, handing both trays up to Dad to tuck into the lower rack of the shopping cart.

For the next twenty minutes, the three of us went up and down the center grocery aisles in an easy, familiar rhythm—Katie and I rolling side by side down each aisle picking out what we wanted from the middle and lower shelves, while Dad pushed the cart behind us, took each jar or box from our hands, and reached up to the top shelves whenever Katie pointed to something just above our seated reach. In the condiment and pasta aisle, we picked out squeeze bottles of yellow mustard and mayonnaise for our honey-ham sandwiches, two boxes of enriched pasta, and two jars of marinara sauce; in the soup and canned-goods aisle, we picked out cans of chicken noodle soup and green beans to stock the new pantry shelves we planned to put in the hallway closet; and in the baking aisle, Katie grabbed a box of buttermilk pancake mix and a bottle of maple syrup for lazy weekend mornings.

When we rounded the back dairy wall, I reached into the chilled case for a carton of Grade A large eggs and a pack of salted butter while Katie pulled two cold half-gallons of whole milk off the middle rack and handed them to Dad to stand upright in the cart.

Then we turned into the cereal aisle—and without saying a single word to each other, both Katie and I rolled straight to the exact same section of shelving and reached out at the exact same instant for two boxes of the toasted oat cereal we had both loved since we were kids.

Ah, the joys of being twins: we shared pretty much everything.

Dad chuckled warmly behind the handlebar of the shopping cart as Katie and I handed him the matching cereal boxes at the same time.

As we rolled out of the cereal aisle past the glass-door frozen-food cases toward the front checkout lanes, a mischievous grin spread across Katie's face.

"One last thing," Katie suggested, braking her chair beside the ice-cream doors. "Let's get ice cream, just to stick it to that old bat."

Laughing out loud, I pulled open the frosty glass door from my chair, Katie reached in to grab a tub of rich chocolate-fudge ice cream, and Dad grinned as he set it right on top of the cart.

At the front register, Dad refused to let Katie pull out her wallet, paying for our entire cart of groceries himself before pushing the loaded cart out to his pickup truck and helping us load every bag into the cab and truck bed for the two-minute drive back to Sea Breeze West.

"I want to organize everything reasonably, now that she is gone," Katie said as we rolled back toward the courtyard of Apartment 3. "I didn't like how she had everything haphazardly placed."

Before Katie could put her plan into action, we saw a familiar minivan pull into the parking lot right outside the white two-rail fence—and something in my chest told me how glad I was that Dad was right here with us.

I recognized that van from anywhere. Rolling flush against Katie's chair, I threw both arms around my twin sister, hugged her as tightly as I could, and whispered against her shoulder, "It's them. I know that van from anywhere."

Standing beside his pickup truck with Katie's wooden dresser still strapped in the bed, our dad turned around, watched Tiffany and her scowling mother step out of the minivan, and planted himself across the courtyard walk like an immovable wall.

"Get your stuff—my daughter put it all in one pile—give us your key, and leave," our father snarled in a low, iron voice that left zero room for argument. "You are no longer welcome in my family."

Neither Tiffany nor her mother dared to talk back to Dad. Avoiding our eyes, they hurried past him to the front threshold where Katie and I had stacked all of Tiffany's bags and boxes in one giant pile. Because they had only come in a minivan, they could only take what would actually fit inside a minivan. Trip after silent trip, Tiffany and her mother hauled out bag after overstuffed bag of her clothes and personal clutter, shoving them into the back cargo area and across the middle bench seat until the minivan was packed nearly to the roof. There was zero room left in their van for the queen bed or for Tiffany's bulky bedroom dresser.

When Tiffany's mother glanced at the stuffed minivan and muttered that they didn't have room for the television, the rabbit-ears antenna, and the VCR that were still sitting on top of Tiffany's dresser against the right wall of the back bedroom beneath the high-mounted through-wall air conditioner, neither Katie nor I wanted a single piece of her electronics left behind—and Dad wasn't having it either.

"You're taking that television and VCR with you right now," Dad said flatly.

Marching straight down the carpeted hallway into the doorless back bedroom, Dad stepped over to the right bedroom wall beneath the high-mounted air conditioner, yanked the power cords out of the wall outlet, unplugged the coaxial lead, lifted Tiffany's television, rabbit ears, and VCR off the top of her dresser in one load, and carried them right out across the courtyard himself. Opening the minivan's passenger-side sliding door, Dad wedged the television, the VCR, and the folded rabbit ears firmly onto the floorboard in front of the middle seat, then held out his open palm.

Without a word, Tiffany dropped her brass apartment key into Dad's hand, climbed into the minivan beside her mother, and backed out of the Sea Breeze West parking lot for the last time in our lives.

Katie promised right away that she would comfort me whenever I needed it—which I did. As the minivan disappeared down West Ocean View Avenue, I could still see the fierce, protective anger burning in my dad's eyes: anger directed squarely at Tiffany and her mother for everything they had put me through.

Refusing to leave Tiffany's dresser inside our apartment for one more minute, Dad marched back into the bedroom, muscled Tiffany's empty dresser away from the right wall below the air conditioner, hauled it out through the straight carpeted hallway and out the front door by himself, and hoisted it into the bed of his pickup truck so he could take it straight to the landfill on his way home. Once Tiffany's dresser was out of the apartment, Dad, Katie, and I brought Katie's wooden dresser in from the pickup truck and placed it right against that exact spot on the right wall of the bedroom below the high-mounted air conditioner, setting Katie's television and her DVD player neatly on top of her dresser. Now the only piece of furniture left behind from Tiffany was the queen bed pushed into the far-left corner of the bedroom—just a box spring and an aging queen mattress whose center was noticeably caving in.

Pressing his hand against the sagging middle of the bare mattress as we stripped it down and fitted our crisp new navy-and-slate-blue sheets, comforter, and four fresh pillows from Chesapeake Bay Mall over it, Dad shook his head at how badly the springs were caving in and promised Katie and me that he would replace the queen bed for us.

As we started arranging our things inside the apartment, Katie rolled up beside me and squeezed my hand.

“You need comfort?” Katie promised gently. “I’m right here for you, and always will be.”

Rolling back out to the large repurposed dining table on the far-left side of the front room—where our seventeen-inch off-white CRT monitor sat beside my 2004 desktop tower fitted with the salvaged off-white three-and-a-half-inch floppy drive, CD-ROM drive, and CD-RW drive from our older desktop computer—I turned to my sister.

“I want to redo the desktop in the front room, so that it’s used for both of us,” I said. “I want to get rid of any traces of her from it.”

“I want to help,” Katie replied, rolling her SwiftChair right up beside mine.

“What I’d like to do is set up the desktop to have user accounts for the two of us,” I said.

“We have laptops,” Katie said.

“I know,” I said, my eyes lighting up as the architecture took shape in my head. “Someday, what I think would be neat is to have it set up so that no matter which computer we log in from, it would have all of our data.” I paused for a moment, glancing at the glowing seventeen-inch CRT screen as I popped open my binder of Quantum OS XN Pro installation discs, then continued, “I just want to get rid of any traces of her from the desktop. Yes, I’m going to reinstall everything, starting from scratch.”

While the fresh installation formatted the desktop hard drive from scratch, Katie and I rolled down the straight right-hand hallway to put fresh bathroom supplies away in the back. Pausing beside the two white bi-folding doors of the hallway closet on the left wall—where the doors opened outward toward the solid right exterior wall—Katie looked thoughtfully at the upper space inside the closet.

“You know?” Katie said. “I think I would like to turn half of this closet into a pantry. We have our dressers for clothes, we have a few coats and whatnot that need to be hung, so there should be plenty of room to get some shelving.”

“We should look for some shelving someday,” I said, noticing how well the half closest to the kitchen would work for pantry shelves while the half closest to the bedroom held our hanging coats above the clear carpeted closet floor.

“Yeah. Meanwhile, we need to finish unloading groceries,” Katie replied as we rolled back out to the open kitchen and she started putting items away in the olive-green cabinets and the refrigerator.

After a few minutes, every last grocery item was put away in our spotless kitchen. Katie transferred onto the bright green three-cushion sofa beneath the front window blinds and allowed me to transfer over and snuggle with my head resting in her lap.

Looking up as Dad stepped back inside from tying down Tiffany’s old landfill-bound dresser in the bed of his pickup truck, Katie smiled warmly.

“Dad, I would like to get some shelving for the closet,” Katie said. “I was thinking it would be perfect for half a pantry, and the other half will be where we hang our clothes up.”

“Next time I am off,” Dad said, resting a gentle, proud hand on Katie’s shoulder and then on mine.

“Alright, Dad. Let us know,” Katie said happily. “Guess you should be heading home.”

When the front door clicked shut behind Dad and the quiet hum of our freshly formatted Quantum OS XN Pro desktop filled the clean, linen-scented living room of Apartment 3, Katie wrapped both arms around my shoulders on the green sofa, and I knew without a shadow of a doubt that the year of hell was over—and that my twin sister and I were never letting anyone tear us apart again.

Part 3: The Goyeau Street Tunnel Bus, The Federal Courthouse on Granby Street, & Protected Non-Traveling Complainant

Date: 2005-11-16 at 14:00 America/New_York

Wednesday, November 16, 2005, 2:00 PM — The Federal Courthouse on Granby Street & Special Agent Morales

By Wednesday afternoon, November 16, 2005, Katie’s wooden dresser, her television and DVD player, her digital clock radio, and her laptop were all settled into their permanent places inside Apartment 3 at Sea Breeze West on West Ocean View Avenue, and forty-eight hours of uninterrupted sleep inside our shared sleeping bag in the dark hallway closet and warm meals at our scrubbed kitchen table had finally steadied her nervous system enough to face a badge.

At two o’clock that afternoon, Dad met Katie and me outside the brick entrance of the Walter E. Hoffman United States Courthouse and federal building on Granby Street in downtown Norfolk—right off CVTA Route 1, just a twenty-minute ride south from Duffy’s Lane. Because Brandon had attempted to force a disabled woman across state and international borders using interstate rail and tunnel-bus tickets after months of coercive isolation in Williamsburg, a detective from the Williamsburg Police Department and an investigator from the United States Attorney’s Office for the Eastern District of Virginia had arranged to take Katie’s statement together in a quiet ground-floor conference room so she wouldn’t have to travel back up the Peninsula.

Katie sat in her compact SwiftChair at the head of the long oak table with my chair locked right beside her right armrest and Dad sitting at her left shoulder. Spread out on the blotter in front of the federal investigator—Special Agent Morales—sat Katie's flip phone containing twenty-four saved voicemails from Brandon between Saturday afternoon and Sunday morning, along with the crumpled paper CVTA transfer slips from her five-bus escape through the rain.

"Take your time, Miss Prairie," Agent Morales said gently, clicking his pen open above his legal pad while the Williamsburg detective turned on a small digital tape recorder. "Start with Friday night and Saturday afternoon in Williamsburg. You mentioned on the phone that Mr. Mercer was trying to take you to Canada against your will, and that you were afraid you might have broken a law by running away from him at the train station."

Katie reached sideways and held onto my hand on the armrest between our chairs, drawing a steady breath before she spoke.

"He told me for weeks that my dad and my brother didn't really care about me, and on Friday night he printed out maps for Windsor, Ontario," Katie said, her voice quiet at first but growing clearer as she went through the exact timeline. "He demanded my birth certificate folder and my state identification card, and when we got to the Williamsburg train station on North Boundary Street on Saturday afternoon in the rain, he locked the motor-brake levers on the back of my power wheelchair and switched off my joystick under the overhang, telling me not to move while he went inside to buy two one-way train and tunnel-bus tickets to Canada. I didn't want to go to Canada, and I didn't want to be near him anymore. When I saw the Colonial Triangle Transit Authority Grey Line bus pull in with Newport News on the sign, I switched my joystick back on, drove onto the bus, and took five buses all the way home to my brother's apartment in West Ocean View."

"And normally, in a case where the victim escapes at the station before boarding the train," the Williamsburg detective noted, leaning forward across the table, "the suspect claims it was all a misunderstanding—that he never actually bought tickets to leave the country, or that he was just planning a short weekend trip."

"Wait until you hear the last voicemail he left on her phone at eleven-thirty Saturday night from Washington before his train headed northwest toward Pittsburgh and Toledo," Dad said grimly, tapping the side of Katie's flip phone on the table. "After he spent two hours marching back to the Virginia Avenue apartment in the rain thinking she was hiding there, he realized she was gone for good and that we would be coming to the police. Rather than stay in Virginia to face the law or lose the cash he had spent at the ticket window, he boarded the northbound evening train alone—furious that she left him holding two non-refundable tickets to Windsor, and swearing he was going across the Canadian border without her so American law couldn't touch him."

Agent Morales raised an eyebrow and pulled his heavy black agency laptop closer across the conference table.

"He actually got on that train to Michigan and tried to cross the tunnel into Ontario?" Morales asked, his fingers already flying across the keyboard to log into the federal Treasury Enforcement Communications System. "Let's see if a Brandon Mercer crossed the Detroit-Windsor border on Sunday."

For ten seconds, the only sound in the quiet conference room was the click of keys and the soft whir of the laptop cooling fan.

Then Agent Morales stopped typing, stared at his screen, and let out a low, astonished whistle.

“Well, I’ll be damned,” Morales said, turning the laptop screen forty-five degrees so Dad, Katie, and I could all see it from our side of the table. “Look at this timestamp from Sunday afternoon, November 13, at four-fifteen.”

The Goyeau Street Inspection Plaza, The Caged CBSA Van, & Stranded in Detroit With Thirty-Four Dollars

Katie leaned forward in her SwiftChair, her blue eyes widening as she read the federal border readout on the monitor.

“United States Customs and Border Protection, Detroit-Windsor Tunnel Plaza, East Jefferson Avenue and Randolph Street,” I read aloud beside her, tracing the lines on the screen with my eyes. “Subject Brandon Mercer returned in custody of Canada Border Services Agency enforcement van following formal refusal of entry at Windsor Goyeau Street terminal under IRPA Sections 20 and 39.”

“Wait—Canada didn’t even let him in?!” Katie gasped, her hand tightening around mine.

“Not even thirty minutes inside the building before they threw him out in disgrace,” Agent Morales said, scrolling down through the scanned attachments uploaded by the Detroit CBP supervisor on Sunday evening. “Look at the narrative filed by the Canadian Border Services officers at the Goyeau Street and Wyandotte Street East plaza, and the secondary customs report from our officers on the Detroit side. Mr. Mercer walked off the Windsor Transit Tunnel Bus on Sunday afternoon carrying a fifty-pound canvas duffel bag after thirty hours without sleep. According to the primary officer at Podium Two, he stood out twenty feet away—sweating in the November chill, jaw clenched, eyes darting toward the ceiling cameras and the exit doors leading out to Park Street East, and his left hand hovering defensively over the yellow ARTS multi-city ticket jacket sticking out of his wet coat pocket.”

Agent Morales clicked open the scanned exhibit pages one by one as the three of us leaned in to read.

“When the Canadian officer asked where he was staying in Ontario and when he was returning to Virginia, Mr. Mercer admitted he had no hotel reservation because he had planned to use your disability income once you crossed the river, and he snapped at the officer that he was going to walk over toward Wyandotte Street and catch a train toward Toronto,” Morales continued, shaking his head at the screen. “Then the officer made him hand over the yellow rail and bus ticket jacket—and saw that he had paid cash in Williamsburg the afternoon before for two one-way tickets to Ontario, including a printed ADA wheelchair bay reservation for Katie Prairie, with zero return ticket to the United States. When the officer asked why he was traveling alone on a two-person wheelchair itinerary and why he was so nervous, Mr. Mercer lost his temper at the podium, barked that his girlfriend had bailed on him at the train station in Virginia, and told a Canadian border officer that as an American citizen with a birth certificate he had a legal right to cross the border."

Beside me, Dad let out a dry, disbelieving laugh. "He told a foreign border agent he had a right to enter their country?"

"Fastest way in North America to get a coded yellow referral slip slapped onto your file," Agent Morales said. "Officer Vance walked him straight into the CBSA Windsor Tunnel District Operations secondary inspection room on Park Street East right off the Goyeau Street plaza, where two Canadian officers unpacked his fifty-pound duffel bag on the steel table. Underneath twenty days of winter clothes, they found his original birth certificate, his Social Security card, his high school diploma folder, three pages of printed internet notes about relocating permanently to Ontario and signing up for provincial healthcare and social assistance, a wallet with thirty-four dollars in crumpled American bills, and a Williamsburg train station ATM receipt showing a remaining checking balance of four dollars and twelve cents."

Right there on the federal computer monitor popped up the high-resolution scan of the yellow ARTS ticket jacket purchased at 3:56 PM on Saturday, November 12—complete with the unused companion voucher reading PRAIRIE, K. — ADA WHEELCHAIR SPACE RESERVED—followed by the stamped Canadian refusal packet citing Sections 20 and 39 of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Protection Act for attempting to reside permanently without legal status and financial inadmissibility.

"Normally, when Transit Windsor brings an inadmissible passenger across the tunnel, Canada puts them back on the public four-fifteen tunnel bus under a Direction to Return form," Agent Morales explained, scrolling to the bottom of the Canadian superintendent's report. "Except when the Shift Superintendent told Mr. Mercer his name, photograph, and fingerprints were permanently flagged in the Canadian enforcement database and that they were sending him back to Detroit with thirty-four dollars, Mr. Mercer lunged halfway across the steel counter shouting that everything he owned was in that bag. So the superintendent canceled the bus turnaround, locked him in the caged rear compartment of a marked CBSA enforcement van, drove him back under the Detroit River through the tunnel, and walked him straight through the steel security door of the United States Customs and Border Protection compound at East Jefferson Avenue and Randolph Street in downtown Detroit."

"And our customs officers searched him all over again?" I asked.

"Under Title 19, Section 1582 of the United States Code, every person returned from a foreign port of entry undergoes a mandatory warrantless border examination," Agent Morales nodded. "Because you were still decompressing here in Norfolk on Sunday afternoon and hadn't filed your police report yet, no Virginia warrant popped up in NCIC when Detroit CBP ran his ID. So our Detroit supervisor did the next best thing: he scanned the entire Windsor refusal file, the Ontario relocation printouts, the Williamsburg ATM receipt, and your unused wheelchair ticket stub directly into the federal Treasury Enforcement Communications System, creating a permanent, time-stamped federal evidentiary record—and then at five-thirty Sunday evening, they buzzed the steel door open and dumped him out onto the sidewalk of East Jefferson Avenue in the thirty-eight-degree Detroit rain."

Dad stared at the screen, his jaw dropping open before a slow, fierce grin broke across his face.

“He handed the federal government the entire prosecution exhibit himself,” Dad said in amazement. “He rode six hundred miles to the Canadian border with Katie’s wheelchair ticket in his pocket and confessed to federal border officers on both sides of the river!”

“In twenty years of federal law enforcement, I don’t think I’ve ever seen a suspect package an interstate coercion and attempted abduction case against himself this neatly,” Agent Morales agreed, printing out the twelve-page border encounter packet on the portable printer beside his briefcase. “When Detroit CBP released him off the federal plaza Sunday night with thirty-four dollars in his pocket, he didn’t even have enough cash for a bus ticket back to Virginia. Two nights ago, a Detroit Police patrol unit ran his ID during a routine check outside a men’s homeless shelter on Cass Avenue after he got into an argument in the intake line over his duffel bag. With this federal border file corroborating the Williamsburg charges, we’ll have a felony fugitive warrant in the NCIC computer before five o’clock today, and the United States Marshals Service task force in Detroit will pick him up right at that shelter’s doors tonight.”

“Protected Non-Traveling Complainant (V-W, Zero Infraction)”

Agent Morales slid the freshly printed twelve-page federal packet across the oak table so Katie could see the summary page.

“He corroborated every single word of your statement to two separate border agencies, Miss Prairie,” Morales added kindly, pointing to the bottom box of the printout. “And just so your mind is completely at ease—look at the bottom line of the CBP record. You are listed strictly as the protected non-traveling complainant.”

Katie blinked at the bottom line of the printed federal report, her fingers tightening around my hand on the armrest as her blue eyes locked onto that four-word phrase. For someone whose autistic mind ran on strict, literal rules, an unfamiliar bureaucratic label in a federal computer wasn’t comforting until every single word was defined down to the millimeter.

“Wait—what does protected non-traveling complainant mean?” Katie asked, her voice rising slightly as she looked straight across the oak table at Special Agent Morales. “Does having my name in the United States Customs and Border Protection database and the Canadian border computer mean I’m flagged? Did I break a railroad or immigration law because he put my name on a ticket to Windsor that I didn’t use? If Nate and I ever want to get passports and take a train into Canada someday on our own, are the border guards going to stop me?”

Agent Morales didn’t brush her question off or give her a vague wave of his hand. Seeing how rigidly she was staring at the code box on the printout, he turned the paper around, laid his pen directly underneath the line item, and broke the exact federal terminology down piece by piece.

“Let’s read each word literally, Miss Prairie, because in federal law, every word on this form has an exact statutory definition,” Agent Morales said calmly. “First, non-traveling means the United States and Canadian governments have officially verified that you never got on that train, never left the Commonwealth of Virginia, and never attempted to cross the international border. Because you escaped at the Williamsburg station at three-fifty-seven on Saturday afternoon, the border computers show you were six hundred miles away when Mr. Mercer showed up at the Goyeau Street plaza in Windsor with a ticket bearing your name."

Katie nodded once, her shoulders dropping half an inch, though her eyes stayed glued to the line. "And complainant?"

"Complainant is the legal word for the victim and witness who brings the criminal complaint against the offender," the Williamsburg detective explained gently from across the table. "When someone buys a ticket in your name to abduct or coerce you across state lines, your name has to appear in the evidence file as the person he targeted—the exact same way a bank's name appears in a bank robbery file. Nobody arrests the bank for getting robbed, Miss Prairie."

"And the word protected is the most important part of all," Agent Morales added, tapping the two-letter status code printed beside her name: V-W, Zero Infraction. "When Detroit CBP and the Canada Border Services Agency entered your name under a Protected Victim-Witness firewall, they attached a permanent legal shield to your identity in both countries' databases. That shield does two things. First, it certifies that you broke zero United States laws, zero Canadian immigration laws, and zero rail tariff rules."

"None at all?" Katie asked quietly, double-checking the rule one more time.

"Zero," Morales said firmly. "Not a felony, not a misdemeanor, not even a civil administrative warning. And second, that shield means that if you and your brother ever apply for passports and take a train or a bus across the Canadian border ten days from now or twenty years from now, the border officer scanning your passport will see a completely clean traveler profile. In fact, the only reason that protected note exists in the system is so that if Brandon Mercer ever tries to use your name at a border crossing again, the computer alerts the officers to protect you and detain him on sight."

Beside me, Katie stared down at the printed code—V-W, Zero Infraction—reading it three times until the literal wording clicked permanently into place inside her head.

She let out a long, slow breath through her nose, looked over at me with her eyes finally clear, and gave my hand a single firm squeeze.

"Non-traveling victim-witness," Katie repeated softly to herself, satisfied at last. "Zero infraction. I didn't break a single rule, Nate."

"Not a single one, sis," I told her, squeezing her fingers back as Dad rested his warm hand on her shoulder. "The only person who broke the law is sitting in a shelter on Cass Avenue in Detroit waiting for the United States Marshals to put him in handcuffs."

Part 4: Thanksgiving Dinner at Dad's House, The Black Friday Closet Project, & The Secret on the Closet Floor

Date: 2005-11-24 at 13:00 America/New_York

Thursday, November 24, 2005, 1:00 PM — Thanksgiving Dinner With Dad in Virginia Beach

“Smell that roasting bird!” Dad smiled from the stove of his single-story brick ranch off Military Highway and Indian River Road as Katie and I rolled our compact SwiftChairs down the hallway into the warm, cinnamon-and-sage-scented kitchen.

It was Thursday afternoon, November 24, 2005—Thanksgiving Day—just ten days after Katie had moved into Sea Breeze West Apartment 3 with me and we had reclaimed our lives from fourteen months of isolation. Earlier that morning, Dad had driven up to West Ocean View in his pickup truck with the folding aluminum ramps to bring both of us down to his house in Virginia Beach for the holiday, and for the first time in over a year, there were no jealous partners, no screaming ultimatums, and no walking on eggshells—just our forty-seven-year-old father and his twenty-year-old twins under one roof again.

“Can we help mash the potatoes or set the table, Dad?” Katie asked, braking her wheelchair beside the kitchen counter and washing her hands at the sink.

“You can take the wooden spoon to the bowl of mashed potatoes while Nate sets the silverware and napkins around the dining table,” Dad said, opening the oven door to baste the golden-brown turkey. “I made sure the two places on the long side of the table have plenty of clearance so you two can roll right up side by side.”

Sitting together at Dad’s dining-room table twenty minutes later—with platters of carved roast turkey, herb stuffing, creamy mashed potatoes and gravy, cranberry sauce, buttered dinner rolls, and green beans spread out between us—Dad raised his glass of iced tea and looked back and forth between Katie and me with quiet emotion in his eyes behind his glasses.

“Last Thanksgiving, our family was scattered in three different places, and I spent every week worrying sick about the two of you,” Dad said softly. “Having my son and my daughter back together at this table today—safe, enrolled in classes together, and looking out for each other the way you two always have—is the best Thanksgiving gift a father could ever ask for.”

“We’re never letting anyone split the three of us up again, Dad,” Katie said warmly, reaching over to squeeze my left hand while tapping her glass against Dad’s and mine.

Over second helpings of turkey and warm slices of pumpkin pie topped with whipped cream, Dad leaned his forearms on the table with a grin.

“By the way,” Dad said, looking at Katie, “I didn’t forget what you asked me ten days ago before I hauled that old dresser off to the landfill. I have tomorrow—Black Friday—and the whole Thanksgiving weekend off work. How about we make a weekend project out of building that half-pantry, half-coat closet in your hallway at Apartment 3?”

Katie’s face lit up immediately. “Really, Dad? You want to build it with us this weekend?”

“I already measured the standard closet depth in my head,” Dad said. “First thing tomorrow morning, we’ll pick up a set of heavy-duty white wire pantry shelves, wall standards, drywall anchors, and a sturdy half-width coat rod, and the three of us will build it right into the left wall of your hallway so you have a real pantry.”

Friday, November 25 – Saturday, November 26, 2005 — The Black Friday Closet Project & The Secret on the Carpeted Closet Floor

At nine-thirty on Black Friday morning, Dad’s pickup truck pulled into the Sea Breeze West parking lot with boxes of white vinyl-coated wire shelving, vertical mounting tracks, a heavy-duty hack saw, a level, and his cordless drill stacked neatly in the bed.

Rolling our wheelchairs down the straight right-hand hallway of Apartment 3 behind Dad as he carried his red steel toolbox inside, Katie and I watched as Dad set his level down and pulled open the two white bi-folding doors on the left wall of the hallway.

Then Dad stopped dead in his tracks.

Looking down at the carpeted floor at the bottom of the hallway closet, Dad went completely quiet.

There, stretched neatly across the entire clear carpeted floor of the closet from the kitchen end to the bedroom end, lay our navy-blue sleeping bag—unzipped and folded over like a double-wide cocoon—with two white pillows nestled side by side at the head against the back corner.

I felt my ears turn warm, and beside me, Katie bit her lower lip. In our excitement over Dad coming by to start the Black Friday shelving project, neither of us had remembered to roll up the sleeping bag and hide the two pillows before he opened the bi-fold doors.

Dad slowly turned his head to the left—looking past the open end of the hallway into the doorless back bedroom, where the queen bed sat pushed into the far-left corner under the window with its brand-new navy-and-slate-blue Chesapeake Bay Mall comforter smoothed flat, crisp, and completely untouched—and then looked back down at the two indented pillows and the shared sleeping bag on the floor of the hallway closet.

Dad knew both of us better than anyone else on earth. He knew that Katie and I are autistic. He knew that ever since we were toddlers in cribs, our deepest source of emotional regulation was hugging and holding onto each other, and he knew that whenever the world got too loud, too bright, or too overwhelming, both of us craved the pitch dark and a tight, confined space where nothing could reach us.

And looking from the pristine, unwrinkled comforter on Tiffany’s caving-in queen mattress to the two well-slept pillows inside the hallway closet, our dad put the whole picture together in three seconds flat.

“Kids,” Dad said in a low, gentle voice, crouching down beside the open bi-fold doors and resting a hand on the edge of the sleeping bag, “you two haven’t slept on that bed in the bedroom a single night since she left, have you?”

Katie and I looked at each other across our wheelchair armrests, and then Katie looked up at Dad with honest blue eyes.

“We tried to make the bedroom look nice with the new comforter so you wouldn’t worry when you came over, Dad,” Katie admitted softly. “We even took two of the four pillows off the bed to put in here. Every time we roll into the bedroom at night and look at that mattress caving in down the middle, all either of us can think about is Tiffany. Neither of us wanted to sleep on Tiffany’s bed.”

“So the two of you have been sleeping in the hallway closet every night?” Dad asked quietly, no anger or judgment in his voice at all—only a deep, aching tenderness behind his glasses.

“Every single night since Sunday the thirteenth—just like we used to do in our square closet back on Greenway Court,” I confessed, looking down at the carpeted closet floor. “Even when we had a regular bed in the main room, we barely ever used it because we always felt so much safer in the closet. When we transfer into our single shared sleeping bag together and pull the two bi-fold doors almost all the way shut, it’s completely dark and snug in here, Dad. The confined space makes us feel secure, and as long as we’re cuddled up holding each other inside the sleeping bag, neither of us has nightmares about Williamsburg or about Tiffany.”

Dad stayed crouched beside the closet threshold for a long moment, swallowing hard as he looked at the two pillows pressed side by side in the narrow dark of the closet. I could see how much it broke his heart that his twenty-year-old son and daughter had been hurt so badly—and left with such a broken, caving-in reminder of Tiffany in their bedroom—that they had retreated into a hallway closet every night just to feel clean and safe in each other’s arms.

When Dad stood back up and pulled his yellow tape measure from his belt clip, his voice was warm and steady.

“Well,” Dad said, tapping the drywall on the left half of the closet nearest the kitchen, “then we are going to engineer this closet around your sleeping spot so nobody ever takes your sanctuary away from you.”

Both Katie and I looked up in surprise. “You don’t think it’s weird that we’re sleeping in the closet, Dad?” I asked.

“Nate, you and your sister just survived fourteen months of hell, and the two of you found a way to keep each other safe and calm through the night,” Dad said firmly, resting a hand on my shoulder and then on Katie’s. “There is nothing weird about two autistic twins who love each other needing the dark, a snug space, and a hug to sleep in peace. Watch what we’re going to do.”

Pulling out his carpenter’s pencil and level, Dad marked the vertical mounting tracks on the kitchen half of the closet wall starting twenty-eight inches above the carpet—leaving the entire bottom level of the closet completely open from end to end so that even with four tiers of white wire pantry shelving mounted on the half closest to the kitchen, and a sturdy coat rod mounted high on the half closest to the bedroom for our winter jackets, the carpeted floor beneath remained a 100-percent unobstructed, full-length sleeping-bag berth for the two of us.

Across Black Friday afternoon and Saturday morning, the three of us worked together in the hallway like a well-oiled crew. From our wheelchairs, Katie and I held the spirit level against the drywall, handed Dad the steel drywall anchors, screws, and wire shelf brackets, and tested the height clearances while Dad drilled the vertical standards into the studs, snapped the four white wire pantry shelves into place on the kitchen side, and anchored the coat rod and upper shelf on the bedroom side.

By Saturday afternoon, when we rolled the boxes of toasted oat cereal, the blue boxes of enriched pasta, and the rows of canned soups and vegetables out of the cramped kitchen cabinets and arranged them neatly across the four white wire pantry shelves on the left half of the hallway closet—with our winter coats hanging on the right half and our freshly fluffed sleeping bag and two white pillows laid smoothly across the vacuumed carpet below—the hallway closet looked like it had been custom-designed from the ground up just for us.

“Half pantry closest to the kitchen, half coat closet closest to the bedroom, and our dark cuddle sanctuary right on the carpeted floor,” Katie beamed, leaning across her armrest to hug Dad around the waist as he packed his drill back into his red toolbox. “Thank you, Dad—it’s even better than I pictured it.”

“You’re welcome, sweetheart,” Dad said, kissing the top of Katie’s head and ruffling my hair as he glanced one more time toward the caving-in queen bed in the back bedroom with a quiet, determined look in his eyes. “And I promise you two—you aren’t going to be stuck with that caving-in mattress forever. As soon as I get things lined up, I’m going to make sure the two of you have a real, brand-new queen bed of your own to share.”

That Saturday night, after Dad drove back across the water to Virginia Beach, Katie and I parked our two SwiftChairs side by side in the hallway, transferred down onto the soft carpet beneath the newly installed white wire pantry shelves and hanging winter coats, and zipped our navy-blue sleeping bag around us. Wrapping both arms tightly around each other with Katie’s head tucked against my chest, we let the soothing deep pressure of our embrace quiet every last echo of the outside world until we drifted off to sleep.

Part 5: The Seattle Transit Blog Inspiration & Quietly Launching Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit

Date: 2005-11-27 at 19:30 America/New_York

Sunday, November 27, 2005, 7:30 PM — The Seattle Transit Blog & A Question Across the Desk

“Look at this site I just found on OmniSearch, Katie,” I said, angling our seventeen-inch off-white CRT monitor slightly toward my twin sister’s wheelchair as the cooling fan inside my 2004 desktop tower hummed steadily on the repurposed dining table along the far-left wall of our front room. “It’s called the Seattle Transit Blog.”

Katie set her cold can of ginger ale down on a coaster beside her open laptop, released her joystick brake, and rolled her compact SwiftChair right up flush against mine so our armrests touched in front of the desk.

It was Sunday evening of Thanksgiving weekend—the night after Dad had finished anchoring the four white wire pantry shelves and the winter coat rod above our sleeping-bag sanctuary inside the hallway closet—and for the past hour, Katie and I had been spreading paper Coastal Virginia Transit Authority folding pocket timetables across the tabletop to plan our upcoming January spring-semester bus commute down to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus. Between my freshly wiped Quantum OS XN Pro desktop—now cleanly configured with separate user accounts for the two of us and zero trace of Tiffany anywhere on the hard drive—and our two laptops flanking the keyboard tray, the left corner of Apartment 3 already felt like a proper twin command center.

“What’s the Seattle Transit Blog?” Katie asked, leaning her chin on my shoulder as her blue eyes scanned the web page glowing on the CRT glass.

“It’s a website run by everyday transit riders out in Washington State who ride TAPS—the Transit Authority of the Puget Sound,” I explained, scrolling down through the front-page articles with the mouse wheel. “Instead of just complaining to themselves at bus stops, a group of regular riders, computer programmers, and wheelchair commuters started a blog where they write out actual proposals for how their regional bus and light-rail grid ought to work.”

Katie leaned closer to the monitor, reading silently beside me as I clicked from one post to the next.

On the screen, the writers at the Seattle Transit Blog were dissecting TAPS King County and Pierce County bus corridors with the exact kind of logical, map-by-map precision that made both of our autistic brains light up. One post broke down how unifying five separate county and municipal bus systems under TAPS—complete with a single regional smart card called the Cascade Card and coordinated low-floor CNG bus fleets—eliminated the penalty for riders crossing city and county lines around the water of Puget Sound. Another post mapped out how the planned TAPS Central Corridor light-rail spine from downtown Seattle toward Tukkwila and the airport would only succeed if local feeder buses were redesigned into high-frequency, clock-face transfer pulses rather than leaving riders stranded at suburban hubs after six o’clock in the evening.

Better yet, down in the comment threads below every post, dozens of daily Puget Sound riders—alongside local transit operators, mechanics, and even city planners—were trading timetable math, pointing out broken wheelchair lifts or missing sidewalk curb cuts, and debating which corridors needed fifteen-minute headways next.

Katie stayed quiet for a long moment, her gaze moving from the glowing Seattle Transit Blog header on the seventeen-inch monitor down to the crumpled stack of paper CVTA timetables spread beside our keyboard: Route 1 from Granby Street and Ocean View down to CCHR; Route 61 across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel from Newport News and Hampton; Route 29 up to Chesapeake Bay Mall and Hilltop; Route 15 down Military Highway; and Route 12 past Dad’s neighborhood off Indian River Road.

“Look at how they write this, Nate,” Katie said softly, tapping her fingertip against the edge of the desk. “They aren’t screaming or venting into the void. They’re posting the real schedules, showing where the connections fail, and laying out constructive ideas for what their regional transit system could be if the people in charge actually listened to daily riders.”

She turned her head to look straight at me, a quiet spark catching in her eyes.

“Why doesn’t Hampton Roads have something like the Seattle Transit Blog for CVTA?” Katie asked.

I blinked, looking from the CRT monitor to my sister. “A transit blog for Coastal Virginia?”

“Think about it, Nate,” Katie said, gesturing toward the paper timetables on our table. “Nobody knows this bus grid better than the two of us. We don’t drive cars. Every single time we go to college at CCHR, or go shopping at Chesapeake Bay Mall or Emerald Creek Mall, or cross the water from the Peninsula, our wheelchairs are rolling up the front ramps of CVTA buses. Two Saturdays ago, when I fled Williamsburg in the pouring rain, it took me five buses across two transit agencies just to get from the College of Charles and Anne to your front door—and if I had missed that 6:45 PM Route 61 bus out of Newport News Transit Center, I would have been stranded on the wrong side of the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel all night long because the cross-harbor bus shuts down before seven o’clock!”

“And ten days ago, when we rode Route 1 down to the CCHR Beach Campus to register for United States History,” I added, the pieces clicking together in my head, “it took ninety minutes each way on a single local bus—and the schedule book says the very last Route 1 back leaves campus at 5:45 PM. Basically the whole Virginia Beach bus grid rolls up the sidewalks at dinnertime.”

“Exactly!” Katie said, sitting up straighter in her SwiftChair. “We talk about what we wish CVTA would fix every single time we’re waiting at a bus shelter together. What if we quietly start our own website and start jotting those ideas down in public—just like the Seattle Transit Blog did for TAPS?”

Hand-Coding Our Template on BlogSphere: Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit

My fingers hovered over the mechanical keyboard as the technical architecture spun up in my head.

“We can do it tonight,” I said, opening a fresh browser window on Quantum OS XN Pro. “We haven’t learned server-side database programming yet to build our own dynamic content engine from scratch, and static hand-coded HTML pages alone would be a pain to update every time someone leaves a comment. But Omni Corporation’s hosted blogging service—BlogSphere—handles the post database, permalinks, RSS syndication feed, and reader comments on their servers automatically, while letting you switch into raw HTML mode to hand-code your own custom page template.”

Katie grinned, pulling her laptop closer across the dining table. “And we’ve known how to write clean HTML by hand since seventh grade at Morrison Middle School. What should we call it?”

We looked down at the teal-and-navy logo printed across the cover of the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority timetable booklets on our desk.

“What about Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit?” Katie suggested. “Simple, direct, and constructive. Anyone searching OmniSearch for CVTA or Hampton Roads bus routes will know right away that we aren’t there to tear public transit down—we’re there to share ideas for what our regional bus system could be.”

“Let’s see if the BlogSphere title is available,” I said, typing Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit into the BlogSphere registration form on the CRT monitor.

A green confirmation line appeared on the screen immediately: the blog name was available.

Side by side at our repurposed dining-table desk, Katie and I clicked through the registration screen, created our shared administrator account under both of our first names—Katie and Nate, two twenty-year-old college students and daily wheelchair transit riders living in Norfolk and commuting into Virginia Beach—and immediately opened the raw HTML template editor.

For the next hour, the only sounds in Apartment 3 were the rhythmic click of our keyboards, the gentle hum of the desktop tower’s cooling fan, and the occasional fizz of ginger ale as the two of us stripped out BlogSphere’s cluttered stock layout and hand-coded our own clean, two-column HTML and style-sheet template from scratch.

Working together the same way we had since we were twelve years old, I coded the structural HTML tables, semantic heading tags, and high-contrast style rules—using a deep coastal-navy banner, crisp white background panels, dark slate body text that was effortless to read without eye strain, and a coastal-teal accent bar—while Katie wrote the sidebar markup on her laptop and transferred the snippets over our local network folder. In the right-hand sidebar, Katie coded an About the Authors box explaining that we were twin brother and sister who used compact power wheelchairs full-time and rode CVTA buses across Norfolk, Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Hampton, and Newport News every week, followed by a clean list of links to official CVTA route schedules, the Colonial Triangle Transit Authority in Williamsburg, and a Blogroll section where the very first link pointed directly to the Seattle Transit Blog that had inspired us.

“Take a look at the preview,” I said, hitting Refresh on the seventeen-inch CRT monitor.

Across the top of the screen ran our clean navy-and-teal masthead:

> Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit
> A Rider-Written Blog Exploring What Public Transit Across Hampton Roads Could Be > Written by Katie & Nate

“It looks clean, fast, and completely readable,” Katie said proudly, squeezing my shoulder. “No flashy clutter, no broken tables, and anyone on dial-up or broadband can load it in two seconds. Now let’s jot down our very first posts so the site doesn’t launch with an empty front page.”

Jotting Down Our First Posts & Planting the Seed for 2008

We didn't issue any grand manifesto or pretend to be transportation lobbyists. We simply opened the New Post editor on BlogSphere and started jotting down the exact, practical realities we lived every time our wheels touched the pavement at a Hampton Roads bus stop—paired with the common-sense improvements we wished CVTA and our local city councils would build.

For our opening post, Katie rolled her chair right up to the center keyboard and typed out the story of what it actually took to ride public transit from the Peninsula to Southside Norfolk on a Saturday afternoon and evening—without naming Brandon or the personal nightmare she had been escaping, focusing entirely on the five-bus regional gauntlet from Williamsburg down through Lee Hall on Route 116, down Warwick Boulevard on Route 107 to Newport News Transit Center, across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel on Route 61 to Wards Corner, and north on Route 1 to West Ocean View.

> Sunday, November 27, 2005 — Welcome to Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit: Why Does Our Cross-Harbor Lifeline Shut Down at 6:45 PM?
>
> Hampton Roads is a metropolitan region of more than one and a half million people divided by water, yet if you rely on a wheelchair and public transit to cross between the Peninsula and Southside Norfolk on a Saturday evening, the entire regional grid hangs by a single thread: the last southbound CVTA Route 61 bus leaves Newport News Transit Center at 6:45 PM (and Hampton Transit Center at 6:57 PM), and isn't even a full route into Virginia Beach—it's an Expressways trip that terminates in Downtown Norfolk at 7:34 PM. Miss that 6:45 PM connection because an upstream bus on Warwick Boulevard runs late, and you are stranded on the wrong side of the water until Sunday morning.
>
> Even worse, while waiting thirty-five minutes at Newport News Transit Center for that final 6:45 PM bus—or transferring through Hampton Transit Center—riders are forced to use public transit center restrooms with half-ripped mirrors, bare glue-stained plywood, broken toilet-paper dispensers hanging by a single bolt, and vandalized stalls. Riders who pay their fares every day deserve cross-harbor Route 61 service that runs until at least 10:00 PM or 11:00 PM seven nights a week, and transit center facilities that are kept clean, safe, and fully accessible.

As soon as Katie clicked Publish on our first entry, I opened a second draft tab so the two of us could jot down the twin Virginia Beach problems we had just run headfirst into during our Monday college-registration trip to CCHR and our rides across the Norfolk–Virginia Beach city line: the ninety-minute local bus crawl, the strict two-hour paper transfer time limit, and the glaring service cliff where buses crossed out of Norfolk into Virginia Beach.

"Look right here at the printed Route 1 and Route 25 schedule booklets, Nate," Katie said, smoothing both folded paper timetables flat under the desk lamp while I typed. "You don't even need an inside source at City Hall to see why Virginia Beach's bus service hours are so terrible compared to Norfolk's. Just look at the columns on Route 1 between Downtown Norfolk and Pembroke East. On the Norfolk side of the route—from Monticello and Charlotte up Granby Street through Wards Corner, Ocean View at Duffy's Lane, and out to the Amphibious Base at the city border—the bus runs every fifteen minutes during weekday rush hours, every thirty minutes midday and Saturdays, and keeps running late into the night until 2:15 AM, seven days a week. Then look at what happens the exact second Route 1 crosses the city line from the Amphibious Base into Virginia Beach along Pleasure House Road, Haygood Shopping Center, and Pembroke East: most of the buses stop at the Amphibious Base and turn right back around into Norfolk! Inside Virginia Beach, Route 1 drops to once an hour, only runs during the day with the last bus leaving Pembroke East at 6:22 PM, and on the back of the brochure under Sunday, the Virginia Beach columns literally just say NO SUNDAY SERVICE in capital letters across an empty white box!"

"And look at Route 25 between Glenrock Mall and CCHR Virginia Beach Campus," I said, tracing my finger across the weekday timetable columns. "It leaves Glenrock Mall in Norfolk every thirty minutes, rolls down to Greenwich Road and Newtown Road right at the Virginia Beach border, and every second bus literally stops at Newtown Road and turns right back around to stay in Norfolk—dropping the Virginia Beach half down Princess Anne Road to CCHR to once an hour, ending at 5:53 PM, with zero weekend service at all."

Katie shook her head with a wry half-smile. "It reminds me of that old local political story Dad told us about Virginia Beach's mayor, Myra Overton. Everyone knows Mayor Overton is a genuinely sweet, grandmotherly lady in person who got her political start serving on the city's library board—and she's been a great champion for the Central Library—but she is not so great a politician when it comes to public transit. Like the story that always goes around among bus riders: there's no way to confirm she ever actually said it, of course, but so they say, if Mayor Overton had her way, Route 20 on Virginia Beach Boulevard would depart Downtown Norfolk, take the Boulevard out to Newtown Road, and turn right back around and stay in Norfolk—just to keep the riff-raff out!"

"Whether anyone at City Hall ever said it out loud or not, that exact Newtown Road mentality is printed right here in the CVTA schedule book," I said, typing the Route 1 and Route 25 timetable numbers straight into our second post without naming any unconfirmed rumors, letting the black-and-white schedule columns speak for themselves. "At CCHR Virginia Beach Campus, the last Route 12 toward Military Highway and Indian River Road leaves at 5:48 PM, the last Route 25 leaves at 5:53 PM, and if a citizen takes Route 33 down to the Virginia Beach Municipal Center to watch a 6:00 PM City Council meeting and needs to connect at CCHR to Route 12, Route 25, Route 29, or Route 36 to get home, they have to leave the Municipal Center on the 5:33 PM bus—twenty-seven minutes before the 6:00 PM City Council meeting even gavels in! And when every Virginia Beach route runs once an hour, if you ride a multi-bus loop across Virginia Beach and Norfolk—say from CCHR up Route 29 to Hilltop, across Virginia Beach Boulevard on Route 20 to Glenrock Mall, down Military Highway on Route 15, and onto Route 12 back to CCHR—your two-hour paper transfer expires before you can even board your final connecting bus, forcing you to pay a second full fare just to finish one trip."

Together, we formatted our second entry—laying out our wish list for late-evening service hours until at least ten o'clock at night on core Virginia Beach routes, timed clock-face transfer pulses at CCHR, Glenrock Mall, and Hilltop, limited-stop express trunk buses along Granby Street, Virginia Beach Boulevard, and Military Highway, continuous curb-cut sidewalks leading to concrete wheelchair boarding pads, and a regional smart-card or day-pass system modeled on what the Seattle Transit Blog documented out in the Puget Sound.

When I clicked Publish on the second post and refreshed our BlogSphere home page, both articles sat cleanly on the screen beneath our navy-and-teal header, ready for OmniSearch's web crawlers to index overnight.

Right then, of course, the visitor counter at the bottom of our sidebar read zero. Nobody in Norfolk or Virginia Beach knew our blog existed yet. We were just two twenty-year-old twins in power wheelchairs sitting side by side in a small West Ocean View apartment at nine o'clock on a Sunday night.

Katie reached across her armrest, laced her fingers through mine, and rested her head gently against my shoulder as we looked at the glowing CRT screen together.

"We don't need a crowd tonight, Nate," Katie said quietly, as if reading my mind. "The Seattle Transit Blog didn't build its readership in a single weekend either. If you and I just keep riding the buses together, studying every route map and timetable change, and jotting down two or three honest, well-researched posts every single week while we finish our degrees—think about where this site will be two or three years from now."

I looked at the calendar pinned beside our desk and did the math in my head. "In 2008, the City of Virginia Beach holds its next Mayor's Race and City Council elections."

"That's three full years of building an archive, showing up in OmniSearch results whenever anyone looks up a CVTA bus route, and building a community of riders across Hampton Roads," Katie said, her voice steady and quietly determined. "If we start putting in the work right now in 2005, then by the time the 2008 Mayor's Race in Virginia Beach comes around, Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit will already have its name out there—and maybe, for once, the people running to lead our city will actually have to pay attention to the people who ride the bus."

Part 6: The CCHR Disability Counselor, The Glossy Fishersville Pitch, & Why Brother and Sister Should Get to Share a Dorm Room

Date: 2007-02-15 at 13:30 America/New_York

Thursday, February 15, 2007, 1:30 PM — "Have Neither of You Heard of DARS?"

"We've hit the ceiling of what static HTML and a hosted BlogSphere template can do, Mrs. Evans," I explained across the cluttered oak desk inside the Disability Support Services office at the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, where Katie and I sat parked wheel-to-wheel in our compact black SwiftChairs with our freshly issued Associate of Applied Science degree transcripts resting in our lap folders. "Over the past fourteen months, while we finished up our final semesters here at CCHR, Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit has grown from zero readers to thousands of daily commuters across Hampton Roads. We want to build our own interactive timetable calculators and database-driven web applications from scratch—and for that, we need a real, intensive course in server-side PHP and SQL relational databases."

“And our timing is pretty tight,” Katie added, resting her hand across my left armrest. “Our apartment lease up on West Ocean View Avenue ends in two weeks on Wednesday, February twenty-eighth. Dad just landed a big new systems engineering job up in Tysons Corner starting Monday, March fifth, and bought a second house near King Street in Alexandria while keeping our brick ranch on Arvin Road here in Virginia Beach for the two of us. Since CCHR doesn’t offer an intensive server-side PHP and SQL track this spring, we came by to ask if you knew of any specialized technical certificate programs we could take without racking up four-year university debt.”

Mrs. Evans, who had signed off on our wheelchair classroom seating accommodations ever since our freshman orientation back in the fall of 2003, took off her reading glasses and looked back and forth between the two of us in surprise.

“Wait a minute, Katie, Nathaniel,” Mrs. Evans said. “Have neither of you ever met with a counselor over at DARS?”

Katie and I looked at each other across our armrests and shook our heads at the exact same time.

“What’s DARS?” Katie asked.

“The Virginia Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services,” Mrs. Evans replied, pulling open her side file drawer and lifting out a crisp state directory folder. “Because both of you use power wheelchairs full-time with progressive neuromuscular weakness, you qualify for full state career-and-technical tuition sponsorship. They don’t advertise on television or highway billboards, so a lot of college students have no idea it exists, but the Commonwealth operates a residential post-secondary campus up in the Shenandoah Valley in Fishersville—right between Staunton and Waynesboro—called Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center.”

At the word rehabilitation, both Katie and I instinctively frowned a little. Neither of us was looking for physical therapy or life-skills classes; we had lived in our own Norfolk apartments for three and a half years, rode public transit everywhere we went, and already held accredited associate degrees.

Mrs. Evans noticed our expressions immediately and held up a reassuring hand. “Now, don’t let the old 1940s name fool you—think of their Business and Information Technology division as a specialized technical college,” she said warmly, sliding a printed course catalog sheet across her desk toward our wheelchairs. “Look right here at track BIT-204: Web Applications Developer. It is a dedicated, full-time classroom program teaching server-side PHP, SQL database design, and dynamic web application architecture. And because Fishersville is right off Interstate 81 and Interstate 64, it’s only a two-hour drive down from your father’s new place in Alexandria.”

Katie leaned over my armrest so our shoulders pressed together as we read the course description:

> Business & Information Technology Division — Web Applications Developer
> Curriculum: Server-Side Scripting (PHP), Relational Database Management

> (SQL), Dynamic Web Architecture, & Client-Server Integration.
> Format: Self-paced, module-driven instruction in a dedicated campus computer laboratory with on-campus dormitory housing and dining included.

“Server-side PHP and SQL, self-paced modules, and zero tuition debt,” I murmured, my eyes lighting up as I traced the course outline. “If it’s self-paced, Katie, two people who have been coding HTML since seventh grade and Quantum Basic since high school could breeze through those modules.”

“Let me call over to the regional DARS office on Newtown Road right now,” Mrs. Evans smiled, reaching for her desk telephone. “If your Ocean View lease ends on the twenty-eighth and your dad starts his Tysons Corner schedule on Monday, March fifth, we can get your intake paperwork expedited this afternoon so you two can check into the dorms on Sunday, March fourth.”

Friday, February 23, 2007, 6:30 PM — The Glossy Brochure Pitch & Our Twin XL Closet Plan

Eight days later, on Friday evening inside Apartment 3 at Sea Breeze West, half-packed cardboard moving boxes sat stacked neatly along the front wall while Dad stood beside our repurposed dining-table computer desk with a steaming mug of coffee in his hand.

Spread open across the wooden tabletop in front of our wheelchairs was the glossy, full-color tri-fold brochure and welcome packet that the regional DARS counselor on Newtown Road had handed us that afternoon—and if you went by the brochure and the counselor’s pitch, Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville sounded like a hidden paradise for two twenty-one-year-old computer geeks.

In the counselor’s office, everything had been pitched as a seamless, adult college experience. Nobody had breathed a word about a two-week mandatory Vocational Evaluation, or touring auto mechanics and woodworking shops, or a Level 1 through Level 4 privilege system, or needing signed yellow paper Hall Passes just to leave campus, or nurses talking to grown adults like kindergarteners. Instead, the counselor had beamed at our CCHR transcripts, assured us that Fishersville was just like going away to a small residential college in the mountains—go to our Web Applications Developer class during the day, sleep in the dorm at night, and be done with it—and flipped open the glossy brochure to show us sunny photographs of red-brick buildings against the Blue Ridge foothills, a heated indoor pool, a student Recreation Hall, a campus dining hall, and a bright, tidy two-bed dormitory room in Barton Hall.

“Look at the photo of the Barton Hall dorm room right here in the center panel, Dad,” Katie said, tapping the glossy photograph showing two standard college Twin XL beds on opposite walls, two desks, and a wide closet door in the corner. “Dr. Carter’s seating clinic already rigged up those two collapsible manual cross-brace wheelchair frames with right-armrest joystick drives for us this morning, so if we ever catch a ride into Waynesboro in a regular car, you just unclip the battery box and fold the frames into the trunk.”

“And the DARS counselor said tuition, textbooks, dorm rooms, and three meals a day in the cafeteria are a hundred percent covered,” Dad said, looking down over our shoulders through his glasses at the brochure. “Since we’re moving your furniture and desktop computer out of here down to the Arvin Road house in Virginia Beach on Wednesday when the lease ends, you two can spend Thursday through Saturday in your own bedrooms on Arvin Road, and I'll drive you straight up to Fishersville on Sunday morning, March fourth, on my way up to Alexandria before I start work in Tysons Corner on Monday."

Once Dad carried a stack of packed book boxes out to the bed of his pickup truck, Katie and I turned our wheelchairs toward each other in front of the dining table and looked closely at the photograph of the two-bed Barton Hall dorm room.

Nowhere in the glossy brochure did it say a single word about men and women being segregated into separate wings of the building, or about a rule forbidding opposite-gender room visits.

"Okay, let's think the dorm setup through," I said quietly, reaching across our armrests to take Katie's hand. "We know dorm beds at any college are Twin XL, so one bed is going to be way too narrow for the two of us to sleep in together—even if we pushed it against the wall."

"And we know why regular colleges normally separate guys and girls in the dorms," Katie replied with complete, matter-of-fact logic. "They don't want boyfriends and girlfriends sharing a dorm room and then having some messy breakup in the middle of the semester where somebody gets kicked out or refuses to move."

Katie squeezed my fingers, a warm, confident smile lighting up her face.

"Except none of that applies to us, Nate," Katie said. "We're twin brother and sister! We can't break up! We've been at each other's side since we were little kids in cribs, and we've lived together every single day of our lives except for the fourteen months we were torn apart by our abusers. Since we're brother and sister—actual family—they should let us share one of those two-bed dorm rooms!"

"That makes total sense," I agreed, nodding as I looked back down at the glossy photo of the dorm room's wide six-foot sliding closet doors. "On paper, we'll put up with being assigned two separate Twin XL beds in the room so their housing chart is happy. And as long as that dorm closet is at least three feet deep by six feet wide like our hallway closet right here—when it's actually bedtime and we close our dorm room door—"

Katie glanced down our short carpeted right-hand hallway toward the open white bi-fold doors of our three-by-six half-pantry, half-coat closet, where our shared navy-blue sleeping bag and two white pillows lay lengthwise across the carpeted closet floor beneath the four tiers of white wire pantry shelves and hanging winter coats so the doors could close completely around us.

"—we'll just unroll our sleeping bag lengthwise inside the dorm closet, pull the closet doors shut so we feel completely enclosed and secure, and sleep cuddled up together like we always do!" Katie finished, grinning from ear to ear as she leaned across our armrests and wrapped both arms tightly around my neck. "Go to our PHP and SQL class during the day, eat in the dining hall, hang out in our room in the evening, and curl up together behind closed doors in the closet at night. We can totally make a dorm room work for a few months, Nate!"

Holding my twin sister close in the warm living room of Apartment 3, I hugged her back with all my strength, resting my cheek against her blonde hair as we folded the glossy Fishersville brochure into our laptop bag and rolled down the hallway to get ready for bed in our closet sanctuary.

Twelve Days at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center & Walking Out for Good

Barton Hall Check-In, Rushing Voc Eval in One Week, & ‘Door Greeter!?’

Part 1: Sunday Check-In at Barton Hall, The Opposite-Gender Dorm Rule, & Expelling the Creepy Roommate

Date: 2007-03-04 at 11:15 America/New_York

Sunday, March 4, 2007, 11:15 AM — Why Dormitories Were Never Built for Us

“It was a whole lot easier for me to bring the two of them up here on a Sunday since I start my new weekday schedule up in Tysons Corner tomorrow morning,” Dad explained to the residential staffer who met the three of us outside the flat-roofed 1960s red-brick entrance of Barton Hall at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville.

“Oh, clients arrive on Sundays all the time, Mr. Prairie, so it’s no big deal at all,” the staffer smiled, propping the heavy glass vestibule door open against the chilly March mountain breeze as Katie and I guided our wheelchairs side by side across the threshold. Our backpacks hung over our canvas seatbacks, and Dad rolled a brass luggage cart stacked with our suitcases and laptop bags right behind us over the scuffed green-and-white terrazzo floor. “Come on back to the dorm office so we can introduce ourselves and get their intake paperwork started.”

Looking down the wide cinder-block corridor, with its buzzing fluorescent troffers and faded 1970s brass plaques reminding visitors that the facility had stood on these former World War II Army hospital grounds since November 1947, I reached across my armrest and brushed my knuckles against Katie’s fingers. She gave my hand a quick, grounding squeeze before we rolled into the intake office behind a wooden counter.

“Here are their updated medical clearances and my emergency contact numbers,” Dad said, setting a manila folder on the blotter in front of the Sunday residential coordinator, a middle-aged woman whose plastic badge read Linda. “You’ll see two addresses listed for me. My Virginia driver’s license has my new primary residence on Sunset Drive near King Street in Alexandria, right down the road from my new engineering job in Tysons Corner, and the second number is our brick ranch on Arvin Road off Indian River Road and Military Highway down in Virginia Beach. I bought that Virginia Beach house from my old landlord years ago and kept it when their West Ocean View apartment lease ended on Wednesday so the twins always have their familiar home and routine waiting for them in Hampton Roads."

"Got both numbers right here on the top sheet," Linda said, clipping the page into two green intake folders. She glanced over the counter at our wheelchairs—the backup folding manual cross-brace frames with spoked push-rim wheels and rear rubber push-handles that Dr. Carter's seating clinic had fitted with right-armrest joystick power-drive kits back after Hurricane Isabel—and raised her eyebrows slightly. "I see the vocational counselor's note here says you two left your full-size power chairs in Virginia Beach?"

"Dr. Carter had these backup folding frames rigged up with joystick drives for us after Hurricane Isabel," I explained, resting my palm on my right-hand controller. "Neither of us has the wrist or upper-arm strength to push manual hand-rims across a campus, so we still drive everywhere with the joysticks, and if we ever catch a ride off campus in a regular compact sedan, you just unclip the battery box underneath and the frame folds flat into a trunk."

"Very smart," Linda said, sliding our two green folders and two brass room keys on plastic tags across the counter. "Now, for your initial Vocational Evaluation period here in Barton Hall, Nathaniel, your room is down on the men's wing, and Katie, you are in Room 157 over on the women's wing. Please remember that under Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center residential policy, there is strictly no visiting dorm rooms of the opposite gender."

Katie and I looked at each other across our armrests as that announcement hit us like a bucket of ice water. Back in Norfolk, when we had looked at the glossy brochure from the DARS office showing a two-bed college-style dorm room in Barton Hall, we had figured that since regular colleges only separate men and women so boyfriends and girlfriends don't have messy breakups—and since we were twin brother and sister who had been at each other's side since we were little and had lived together our entire lives except when we were separated by our abusers—they would let us share a room, put up with two Twin XL beds on paper, and cram ourselves into our sleeping bag in the dorm closet at bedtime.

Keeping my voice completely polite, I leaned forward in my chair toward the counter.

"Excuse me, ma'am—I think there might be a misunderstanding," I said politely. "Katie and I aren't a boyfriend and girlfriend who might break up; we're fraternal twins—brother and sister. We thought since we're family, we'd be able to share one of the two-bed rooms. We've been at each other's side since we were little, we've lived together for the last three and a half years while earning our associate degrees at the Community College of Hampton Roads—except when we were separated by abusive partners—and whenever one of us gets overwhelmed at night, the other one is right there."

"I understand you're brother and sister, Nathaniel, and that you're used to sharing an apartment," Linda replied in a practiced, unyielding voice, tapping the highlighted paragraph on the housing sheet, "but this is a state residential facility, not an off-campus apartment. We keep men and women on separate wings because we can't have male and female clients in the same dorm rooms hooking up behind closed doors."

Katie and I blinked at her, both of our literal autistic brains stalling on the slang phrase.

“Hooking up?” Katie asked politely, tilting her head. “Like hooking up a computer monitor? What does ‘hooking up’ mean?”

Linda paused, her cheeks coloring slightly as she looked across the counter at the two of us and lowered her voice a notch. “It means having sex, Katie.”

Katie and I looked at each other and then looked straight back at Linda in complete earnestness. Both of us knew as a memorized rule that brothers and sisters are not supposed to have sex with each other—even if neither of us had ever really understood why people made such a big deal about it.

“Oh!” Katie said matter-of-factly. “Well, we’re brother and sister—we know brothers and sisters aren’t supposed to have sex with each other, so of course we won’t have sex!”

“Yeah, of course we won’t,” I agreed earnestly, nodding right alongside my twin sister.

Linda stared at the two of us for a second, momentarily flustered by how plainly we had just said that across the intake counter, before clearing her throat and falling right back on the rulebook.

“Be that as it may, nobody shares a room across the gender line here, and opposite-gender room visitation between six and eleven in the evening is an earned privilege reserved exclusively for Level 4 clients over in Cantor Hall,” Linda said firmly. “All newly arriving clients here in Barton Hall start at Level 2. You two are more than welcome to spend time together in the dorm lobby, the outdoor courtyard, the recreation hall, or the dining hall—just not inside the dorm rooms proper. Since you just arrived today, I’m going to escort you down the halls right now so you can help each other unpack your bags, but once your suitcases are unpacked, you’ll each have to leave the other’s room.”

Katie and I exchanged a deeply unhappy look across our armrests, biting our tongues and staying polite at the counter even as our hearts sank at being forced into separate rooms on opposite wings. As Linda stood up from her chair and stepped around the counter, however, the male residential staffer who had held the front door lingered by the office threshold, looked down at the standard rubber push-handles sticking out the back of Katie’s folding frame, and reached both hands straight for her grips without asking as if he were about to wheel her down the corridor himself.

Katie clicked her joystick controller off, slammed both manual wheel-locks forward with a sharp metal clack, whipped her head around, and went straight after him with an aggressive edge in her voice that she almost never used back home.

“Get your hands off my wheelchair right now!” Katie barked across the lobby. “Do not touch my push-handles! Do I look like a piece of luggage to you?! Our chairs have joysticks on the armrests for a reason—my brother and I drive ourselves, and if you grab my chair without my permission again, you and I are going to have a serious problem!”

“Hey—watch your tone with residential staff, young lady,” the staffer bristled, jerking his hands back from her rubber grips while his face turned red.

“Watch your hands around my sister’s wheelchair!” I shot right back, guiding my own chair flush alongside Katie’s so nobody could step between us.

Linda held up a hand between the counter and the doorway, frowning sharply at the two of us. “Katie, Nathaniel, I’m going to let that slide with a verbal warning since you two just walked through the door five minutes ago and I know check-in day is stressful, but aggressive outbursts toward staff are a write-up offense here at Roosevelt.”

Neither Katie nor I apologized. Instead, both of us fixed the staffer by the doorway with identical, disgusted looks—staring him straight in the eye with an unblinking glare that amounted to a flat-out dare: go ahead and write us up right now if you want to.

The staffer swallowed, looked away from our twin glares, and shoved his hands into his pockets without touching his clipboard.

With Linda walking beside us down the men’s corridor first, Katie and Dad helped me unload my clothes and laptop bag onto my side of the narrow cinder-block two-bed room—where my assigned roommate was already lounging on the opposite mattress watching us in silence—before we rolled across the building to Room 157 on the women’s wing to help Katie unpack alongside her new roommate, who greeted all three of us warmly.

As soon as the last suitcase was stowed under Katie’s bed and we rolled back out to the neutral territory of the Barton Hall lobby with our MagnaBook laptops resting on our lap trays, Katie steered her wheelchair flush against mine and leaned close to my ear.

“I noticed your roommate was staring at my tits the entire time I was helping you unpack,” Katie said quietly, her jaw tight.

“I noticed it too, and I wasn’t thrilled about it for a second,” I answered, my blood simmering as I put my arm around my sister’s shoulders while our laptops booted up. “Your roommate back in Room 157 seemed like a genuinely nice person, whereas I think I got stuck with a complete jerk of a roommate. What do you want to do?”

“No offense, Nate, but your roommate gave off a really bad first impression,” Katie sighed, before turning in her seat and pulling me into a tight, reassuring hug so I knew she didn’t blame me for who the housing office had put in my room.

A moment later, Dad walked out of Linda’s office tucking our signed carbon copies into his coat pocket. “All right, you two, the paperwork is finished,” Dad said warmly. “Come on—I’m taking both of you into Waynesboro to get a real lunch before I have to get on the highway toward Alexandria.”

3:00 PM — House Guard 2 in the Dorm Lobby, Cafeteria Rations, & The 11:00 PM Curfew Check

“I wish they had an actual lap pool here instead of just the small therapeutic pool, but oh well,” Katie sighed, peering through the interior observation glass of the campus recreation hall at the quiet, steamy natatorium before glancing down at her wristwatch as her stomach gave an audible rumble. “I’m already hungry again and it’s only three o’clock, even after that big lunch Dad bought us in Waynesboro.”

“Look at the board games over on that table—half the boxes are missing their lids, and the TV in the lounge is turned up way too loud,” I said, turning my chair beside hers. “Want to head back across the walkway to the Barton Hall lobby?”

“Please,” Katie nodded, rolling out the automatic doors beside me into the cool afternoon air.

We parked wheel-to-wheel on the far side of the Barton Hall lounge chairs, well out of earshot of the front desk.

“If it weren’t for that silly opposite-gender dorm rule, I’d say let’s just head back to one of our rooms and close the door,” I muttered, looking toward the two separate wing doors at opposite ends of the lobby.

Instead, I unzipped my backpack, pulled out a two-way stereo headphone splitter, and plugged both of our headsets into the audio jack of my laptop. Sliding a DVD into the drive, we queued up the brownstone booby-trap sequence of one of our favorite childhood Christmas comedies, House Guard 2: Lost in Manhattan—right where the kid stands on the rooftop throwing bricks down at the two bumbling burglars.

Within two minutes, both Katie and I were shaking with laughter across our armrests—laughing so hard that half a dozen other students sitting around the dorm lobby looked over and asked what on earth was so funny. Grinning, Katie hit the rewind button back to the scene where the two bandits were robbing the toy-store cash register, unplugged the headphone splitter so the sound played through my laptop speakers, and angled the screen toward the lounge so the other students could crowd around and laugh right along with us.

When the sequence wrapped up at quarter to five, we shut down the DVD player and zipped our laptops back into our bags.

“How about we roll inside the courtyard together for some fresh air,” Katie suggested, lacing her fingers through mine, “and then we’ll split up for two minutes just to drop our backpacks off in our rooms, wait for each other right outside the wing doors, and head to dinner together?”

“Deal,” I said, giving her a quick hug before we parted at the hallway junction.

When I unlocked my door on the men’s wing and rolled inside to set my backpack on my desk chair, my roommate looked up from his pillow with a sleazy smirk. “Hey, man—who was the hot blonde babe in here with you earlier?”

I didn't dignify him with a single word. Locking my desk drawer, I spun my wheelchair around in the narrow aisle, rolled straight back out to the courtyard walkway where Katie was waiting for me, and told her verbatim what he had just said.

"Gross," Katie said, curling her lip in disgust as we turned toward the covered breezeway at five-thirty with the stream of residential students heading to the main cafeteria. "If he walks past us tonight, hold my hand so he gets it through his thick skull not to talk to me."

Inside the noisy dining hall, we picked up two plastic trays, balanced them across our lap trays along the stainless-steel rail, and steered over to a small table for two near the wall.

"Looks like burgers and french fries," Katie said, picking up a limp, lukewarm fry from her plate. She took one bite and made a face. "That tastes nasty!"

At the next table over, a veteran student in a faded hoodie snorted around his plastic fork. "You two must be new here. Get used to your rations."

"Well," I sighed, poking dubiously at my gray hamburger patty, "the food definitely isn't the greatest, but what choice do we have?"

As soon as we dumped our trays at the dish window and rolled back out into the cool dusk air toward Barton Hall, Katie reached across our armrests and took my hand, giggling softly under her breath. "Just in case your creepy roommate is watching from the sidewalk—I want it to look like we're dating."

"Where to now?" I asked as the front doors of Barton Hall slid open. "Dorm lobby?"

"Yeah," Katie said softly, her smile fading a little as she looked toward the separate hallway doors. "Until it's time for bed. I miss living together back home."

We parked in our quiet corner of the lobby, where I wrapped my arm around her shoulders and Katie snuggled against my chest with a long yawn. "We'll have breakfast together first thing in the morning," I promised, resting my cheek against her hair, "and then we're staying right at each other's side through every minute of evaluation."

By nine o'clock, both of us were nodding off in our chairs. Tearfully, we hugged each other goodbye in the middle of the lobby before reluctantly turning down our separate wings for the night.

When I rolled into my room on the men's wing, the bed across from mine was empty. Relieved to have the room to myself, I changed into my pajamas, locked my wheelchair brakes beside the frame, and transferred under the stiff institutional blanket—lying awake in the dark waiting for the eleven-o'clock curfew check.

Five minutes past eleven, the hallway door clicked open and a night staffer shone his flashlight inside, pausing when the beam hit the empty mattress across from mine.

"Where's your roommate?" the staffer asked.

“I haven’t seen him at all tonight,” I said from my pillow. “And considering the sexually suggestive things he was saying about my sister earlier today, I really don’t want to see him right now.”

The staffer stepped inside and lowered his clipboard. “What did he say?”

“Right after I finished unpacking, he asked me, ‘Who’s the hot blonde babe?’” I replied. “And earlier, while my sister was helping me unpack, she noticed him staring at her breasts.”

“What’s your sister’s name?” the staffer asked, uncapping his pen.

“Katie. Katie Prairie. Room 157,” I replied.

When my wristwatch alarm beeped at quarter to seven on Monday morning, I looked across the narrow room and saw my roommate passed out face-down on top of his bedspread in his street clothes, reeking of stale beer and marijuana. Keeping silent so I wouldn’t wake him, I got dressed, transferred into my wheelchair, and rolled straight out to the Barton Hall lobby, where Katie came through the women’s wing doors less than a minute later and wrapped her arms around my neck.

Before we could head out the front doors toward the cafeteria, the weekday morning dorm supervisor—a tall, no-nonsense woman with steel-gray hair—stepped out of the residential office and beckoned to the two of us.

“Nathaniel, Katie, step into my office for thirty seconds,” she said, closing the door behind our wheelchairs. “I wanted both of you to know before you head to breakfast that Nathaniel’s roommate is being expelled and escorted off the property by Campus Police this morning. At eleven-fifteen last night, night staff caught him trying to sneak past the fire doors into the women’s dormitory wing to pressure another female client into sleeping with him, and just like you, Katie, that young woman wanted nothing to do with him and turned him straight in because he wouldn’t stop harassing her. Between that, his prior write-ups, and staggering back onto campus intoxicated after curfew, he is done here. You have that room to yourself, Nathaniel.”

Katie let out a long breath beside me, her shoulders dropping two inches in pure relief as we thanked the supervisor and rolled back out into the morning hallway together.

Part 2: Rushing Voc Eval in One Week, Auto Shop & ‘Door Greeter!?’, Refusing Separation, & Staying Stuck on Level 2

Date: 2007-03-05 at 07:15 America/New_York

Monday, March 5, 2007, 7:15 AM — The Medication Line, Auto Shop & Woodworking, & “Door Greeter!?”

“We need our breakfast,” Katie said as we rolled side by side out of the Barton Hall lobby toward the dining hall breezeway.

“I’m guessing breakfast is going to be just as nasty as dinner was last night,” I replied as the automatic doors slid open into the crisp March mountain air.

Twenty minutes later, after pushing watery scrambled eggs and limp toast around our plastic plates, we rolled down the corridor to join the long single-file line of Level 2 clients waiting outside the dispensary window for our morning maintenance medication.

“This is so stupid,” Katie whispered in exasperation as we inched forward in our joystick-outfitted wheelchairs. “We’re twenty-one years old, and we’re both used to managing our own medication bottles back home in our apartment.”

When we reached the counter, the dispensary nurse leaned toward the opening and spoke to us in a high-pitched, sing-song voice as if we were seven-year-olds learning how to swallow a chewable vitamin. “Good morning, friends! Ready to take our morning pills with a big sip of water?”

I looked straight across the counter at her. “Ma’am, we have associate degrees and we’ve managed our own prescriptions in our own apartment in Norfolk for three and a half years,” I said flatly. “You don’t need to talk down to us like children. Just hand us the paper cups and check our names off the clipboard.”

The nurse’s patronizing smile vanished immediately, and she handed over our pleated paper cups in silence.

“I don’t think I’m going to like it here,” I said quietly to Katie as we rolled away from the window, slipping my arm around her shoulders.

“I already miss the apartment,” Katie whispered back, leaning against my arm.

Right then, angry screams echoed from the main entrance doors down the hall.

“You are not my boyfriend anymore, and I don’t ever want to see you again!” a girl shouted, shoving through the doors.

“Get out of my life too, jerk!” a boy shouted right back at her.

Down the hallway from us, another student sighed and shook his head. “Those two. Always fighting. Always arguing.”

Katie looked over at me with a wry, grateful smile. “I’m glad we’re siblings, Nate.”

I pulled her into a warm hug across our armrests and whispered, “Yeah. No boyfriend-girlfriend drama between us.”

At eight-thirty sharp, we followed the directional signs into the Vocational Evaluation wing of the Bates-Harding Building and parked side by side at a scarred laminate table at the front of the intake room. At the dry-erase board stood the lead evaluation specialist, Ms. Hollis, holding a thick stack of yellow checklists while her evaluation aide, Mr. Miller, passed them down the rows.

“Welcome to Vocational Evaluation,” Ms. Hollis announced briskly. “Before any client at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center is permitted to enter a vocational training classroom, you will spend the next two full weeks right here in Voc Eval completing three mandatory requirements under Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services guidelines. First, you will demonstrate independent-living skills to our staff —making your dorm bed with proper corners, doing a load of laundry, and preparing a basic meal in the test kitchen. Second, you will rotate with Mr. Miller through our campus trade shops—auto mechanics, woodworking, nursing assistant, food service, and retail—so we can determine which trade is the best fit for you. And third, our team will grade your daily socialization and appropriate social skills."

Katie raised her hand immediately. Neither of us had been prepared for any of this—not the rules, not the baby-talk at the dispensary window, and certainly not two weeks of mandatory Vocational Evaluation. We had zero interest in the rehabilitation side of RRC; we had come to Fishersville strictly for the Web Applications Developer class, fully expecting to treat the center like college—go to class, sleep in the dorm, and be done with it.

"Excuse me, Ms. Hollis?" Katie said. "Nathaniel and I already have our associate degrees from the Community College of Hampton Roads, we lived in our own off-campus apartments in Norfolk for three and a half years, and our vocational counselor in Hampton Roads specifically sent us here for the Web Applications Developer PHP and SQL track. We've been writing HTML since seventh grade and Quantum Basic since high school. Why do we need to spend two weeks touring auto mechanics, woodworking, and nursing?"

Ms. Hollis tapped her pen against her clipboard with a tight, practiced smile. "Everyone follows the same two-week evaluation protocol here, Katie. Nobody skips the trade rotations. Mr. Miller, take the group down to the auto mechanics bay first."

For the next three hours, Katie and I sat side by side in mounting disbelief as Mr. Miller led our cohort from one manual-labor shop to the next. In the auto mechanics bay, we sat parked beside a hydraulic lift smelling burnt motor oil while an instructor demonstrated a heavy pneumatic impact wrench that neither Katie nor I had the upper-body strength to lift off a workbench, let alone use standing under a car chassis. Forty-five minutes later, Mr. Miller marched the group into the woodworking shop, where fine oak sawdust drifted over our lap trays and screaming table saws vibrated through the concrete floor. Right before lunch, we were wheeled into the nursing assistant training lab to watch students practice two-person transfers lifting a hundred-and-fifty-pound plastic mannequin onto a hospital bed.

As soon as Mr. Miller led the group back into the Bates-Harding evaluation room at eleven-thirty, I steered straight up to Ms. Hollis's desk with Katie right beside me.

"Ms. Hollis, that tour makes zero sense for the two of us," I said bluntly. "We're both in wheelchairs with progressive neuromuscular weakness in our legs and arms. We can't stand under a hydraulic lift in an auto shop, we can't stand at a table saw in a woodworking shop, and we certainly can't lift hospital patients in nursing school. We came here to write server-side PHP and SQL code."

Ms. Hollis looked down at our wheelchairs—never once glancing at our CCHR transcripts in her folder—and put on a bright, syrupy smile.

"Now, Katie, Nathaniel, here at Roosevelt we have to evaluate realistic physical alternatives in case the stamina demands of software engineering prove too taxing," Ms. Hollis said, tapping her pen on the desk blotter. "If the computer track doesn't pan out, we have a wonderful partnership with ValueMart right down the road in Waynesboro! We could train Katie to be a ValueMart Door Greeter—it has very minimal physical requirements, and you just sit in the vestibule and smile at shoppers—and Nathaniel, with your polite voice, we could place you in our Food Service Prep or stockroom tagging track!"

Katie stared at her in utter, stunned disbelief.

"Door greeter!?" Katie repeated out loud, her voice ringing off the painted cinder-block walls so loudly that every student in the room turned around to look. "My brother and I have associate degrees with honors! We write HTML, CSS, and Quantum Basic by hand, we run a regional transit analysis website read by city councilors across six cities, and you look at two people in wheelchairs and think our career ceiling is sitting by the sliding doors at ValueMart saying hello to shoppers?!"

"I'm simply explaining all of the options DARS offers our clients," Ms. Hollis said stiffly, her cheeks reddening as Katie and I exchanged a look of pure disgust and rolled back to our table.

Tuesday, March 6, 2007, 9:15 AM — "Do Not Grab Our Wheelchairs!" & Refusing Separation at Social Break

"All right, group, let's head down the hall to the independent-living test kitchen so we can check off your meal-prep rubric!" Mr. Miller called out at nine-fifteen on Tuesday morning as Katie and I closed our testing binders and powered on our right-armrest joysticks to roll out into the Bates-Harding corridor.

Before we had even cleared the doorway, Mr. Miller walked briskly up behind the two of us without saying a word, reached out, and clamped his right hand onto Katie's rear rubber push-handle and his left hand onto my rear rubber push-handle to shove both of our wheelchairs down the hallway himself.

The sudden manual shove against our motorized wheel hubs jolted both of our cross-brace frames forward at once.

"Hey—take your hands off our wheelchairs right now!" I barked loudly, my voice echoing down the terrazzo corridor as both Katie and I clicked our drives off and slammed our manual wheel brakes locked, stopping Mr. Miller dead in his tracks.

"Excuse me!" Katie shouted, twisting around in her seat so every evaluator and student in the corridor heard her displeasure. "Do not grab my wheelchair! Our chairs have joysticks on the armrests—we drive ourselves! Grabbing somebody's wheelchair without asking is no different from grabbing our bodies in the middle of the hallway!"

Mr. Miller jerked both hands back as if the rubber grips had burned his palms, his face turning pink. "Oh—now wait a second, Katie, Nathaniel, I was just trying to be helpful and get everyone down to the test kitchen on time—"

"If you want us at the test kitchen, you tell us where the door is with your voice, just like you tell every walking student in this hallway!" I said loudly, refusing to lower my volume by a single decibel. "In our community, a wheelchair is an extension of the person sitting in it. You wouldn't walk up behind a standing twenty-one-year-old woman and shove her down the hall by her shoulders without asking, and you do not put your hands on our push-handles to push us around this center!"

Mr. Miller muttered a flustered apology and kept six feet behind us all the way to the test kitchen—where Katie and I briskly fried eggs, toasted bread, scrubbed the skillet clean, and checked off every single independent-living box on the clipboard in twenty minutes flat.

By two-fifteen on Wednesday afternoon, however, during the scheduled Vocational Evaluation social break in the painted cinder-block break room, Ms. Hollis marched across the linoleum toward the quiet corner where Katie and I sat parked wheel-to-wheel drinking two cans of ginger ale and sketching relational database tables—with Mr. Miller trailing right behind her.

"Nathaniel, Katie," Ms. Hollis said, rapping her pen against her clipboard with a disapproving frown, "for the past three days, the evaluation team has noted that the two of you have not separated once—not in the evaluation room, not during break times, not in the cafeteria, and not in the Barton Hall lounge."

Katie and I looked up from our notebook at the exact same second. "That's because we're twins, ma'am," Katie said firmly. "We do everything together."

"Well, while you are in Vocational Evaluation, that needs to change—especially during social times," Ms. Hollis said briskly, gesturing toward two opposite corners of the break room. "Part of your evaluation is proving that you have independent social skills. You two are twenty-one years old—you are supposed to be branching out, making your own individual friends, and going your separate sibling ways during the day. Starting right now for the rest of social break, Nathaniel, you are going over to Table One, and Katie, you are going over to Table Four. Mr. Miller, go ahead and wheel Katie over to Table Four."

Before Mr. Miller could bring his fingers within six inches of Katie's rear push-handles, Katie and I reached across our armrests, locked our hands together in an unbreakable grip, and let the entire room hear our displeasure at full volume.

"Keep your hands off my sister's wheelchair!" I barked across the break room, making every conversation at Tables One through Four stop dead. "We told you yesterday—nobody touches our chairs, and nobody pushes us around!"

"And we are NOT being handled or separated like five-year-olds during break time!" Katie said loudly, her blue eyes blazing straight at Ms. Hollis.

Ms. Hollis blinked, visibly rattled by two Level 2 clients telling her no in front of the entire cohort. "Excuse me, Katie? Nathaniel? Refusing a socialization directive during social time goes down as a deficiency on your Vocational Evaluation rubric."

"Then write it down in capital letters as a deficiency!" Katie shot back loudly enough for the whole wing to hear. "My brother and I are perfectly polite to everyone in this room! Just Sunday afternoon in the Barton Hall lobby, we shared our DVD with half the building and had everyone laughing together! We know how to talk to people, we already passed your bed-making, laundry, and kitchen checks yesterday, and we already have associate degrees! What we do not tolerate is Center staff grabbing our wheelchairs like they own our bodies or trying to pry twin brother and sister apart during social time just to check a box on your clipboard!"

"And we are not sitting in Vocational Evaluation for a second week," I added loudly and evenly, holding Katie's hand tightly across our armrests. "Put the entire two-day Web Applications Developer technical, mathematical, HTML, and logic exam battery on our table at eight-thirty tomorrow morning. Either we test out of Voc Eval in one week and start the Web Applications Developer class on Monday morning, or we will call our father in Alexandria right now, pack our suitcases in Barton Hall, and go home tonight!"

Every student at the four break tables was staring straight at Ms. Hollis and Mr. Miller. Pressing her lips into a thin line, Ms. Hollis motioned for Mr. Miller to step back. "Fine," she said clippedly. "Be at Testing Table Two at eight-thirty sharp tomorrow morning, and we'll see if you can pass the full Web Applications packet in one sitting."

Thursday, March 8, 2007, 8:30 AM — The Outdated 1990s Exam Battery & Proving We Don't Cheat

When Katie and I rolled into the Vocational Evaluation testing room at eight-twenty-five on Thursday morning and locked our manual wheel brakes side by side at Testing Table Two, Ms. Hollis and Mr. Miller were already waiting for us with matching looks of smug anticipation.

Having watched us refuse to sit at separate tables during Wednesday afternoon's social break, both of them were clearly convinced that the real reason Katie and I insisted on sitting wheel-to-wheel was so we could cheat off each other—either whispering answers back and forth or letting one twin carry the other through the math and coding sections so she could disqualify us both and ship us right back to the ValueMart Door Greeter and Food Service tracks.

Ms. Hollis stepped up to the laminate tabletop and slapped down two three-inch-thick, spiral-bound exam packets, two green optical bubble sheets, two lined legal pads for scratch work, and four sharpened No. 2 pencils.

"Since the two of you flatly refused to sit at separate testing tables," Ms. Hollis announced pointedly, resting her palms on the packets, "I have pulled two different versions of the five-part Web Applications Developer entrance battery. Nathaniel, you have Form A. Katie, you have Form B, where all of the problem sets and multiple-choice items are scrambled in a completely different order. You have until three-thirty tomorrow afternoon to complete all five booklets: Computer Hardware and Operating Environments, HTML and Web Page Design, Applied Algebra, Binary and Boolean Logic, and Relational Database Normalization."

She gestured to Mr. Miller, who pulled a metal folding chair right up to the opposite side of Testing Table Two—barely four feet from our front casters—and sat down holding a clipboard and a digital stopwatch while Ms. Hollis positioned herself directly behind our wheelchairs.

"Mr. Miller will be sitting right here facing your hands and eyes the entire time, and I will be monitoring from behind your chairs," Ms. Hollis said coldly. "If either of you whispers a single word, glances sideways at the other person's booklet or bubble sheet, taps a code on your wheelchair armrests, or shares a single line of scratch paper, both of your exams will be confiscated on the spot for academic dishonesty, you will receive an automatic failure on your DARS evaluation rubric, and you will be permanently disqualified from the Information Technology track. Do we understand each other?"

Katie looked straight up at Ms. Hollis without flinching. “Ma’am, my brother and I graduated with honors from the Community College of Hampton Roads three months ago,” she said evenly. “We don’t sit together to copy answers. We sit together because we’re twins, and neither of us has ever cheated on a test in our lives. Start your clock.”

Ms. Hollis pressed the button on her stopwatch. “Begin.”

Without looking at each other once, Katie and I rested our inner forearms lightly along our adjacent wheelchair armrests—just enough familiar twin contact to keep our nervous systems calm—and flipped open the heavy cardstock covers of Booklet One at the exact same second.

Ten seconds into page one, I heard Katie let out the exact same quiet, disgusted sigh through her nose that had just escaped mine.

It was March of 2007. Katie and I had been hand-coding HTML since seventh grade at Morrison Middle School in 1997, writing Quantum Basic 6.0 since high school in 2001, and building modern standards-compliant web pages at CCHR—and the official Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services “Web Applications Developer” Vocational Evaluation exam battery sitting on our table hadn’t been updated since the mid-1990s.

In Booklet One—Computer Hardware and Operating Environments—there wasn’t a single question about modern 2007 web servers, USB flash drives, or broadband ethernet networks. Instead, Question Three asked how many 1.44-megabyte three-and-a-half-inch floppy disks were required to back up an eleven-megabyte directory without compression. Question Nine asked how to set physical plastic jumpers on an ISA expansion card to resolve an IRQ interrupt conflict between a parallel printer port and a serial mouse. Question Fourteen asked how to edit startup configuration files in Q-Core so a desktop computer could free up enough conventional memory below the 640-kilobyte barrier to launch a database utility, and Question Twenty-Two asked us to calculate how many minutes it would take to download a three-megabyte uncompressed bitmap image over a 28.8-kilobit-per-second dial-up telephone modem.

Shaking my head in silent disbelief as I darkened the green bubbles on Form A, I flipped to Booklet Two—HTML and Web Page Design—and nearly groaned out loud.

Every single question treated 1996 browser wars and long-deprecated HTML 3.2 markup as if they were the pinnacle of modern software engineering. Instead of cascading style sheets or semantic markup, the test demanded to know the exact body-tag attribute to tile a repeating sixteen-color GIF image across a webpage background, how to format paragraph text using deprecated inline font-face tags, how to slice a 640-by-480-pixel VGA screen into three separate scrolling framesets, and which proprietary tag made a line of warning text blink on and off or scroll horizontally across the screen like a stock ticker. Beside me, I could hear the crisp, irritated scratch of Katie’s No. 2 pencil writing a brisk margin note on her written-response sheet before she bubbled in the obsolete answer the grading key wanted.

And yet, for the next three hours, Mr. Miller sat four feet away leaning forward on his elbows, staring unblinkingly from my eyes to Katie's eyes, while Ms. Hollis paced back and forth behind our rear push-handles every four minutes waiting to pounce on a sideways glance that never came.

She caught nothing—because there was nothing to catch.

Neither Katie nor I spoke a syllable, tilted a page, or lifted our eyes from our own paperwork. When ten o'clock arrived and Mr. Miller cleared his throat to announce the fifteen-minute morning restroom and water-fountain break, both of us simply shook our heads without looking up and kept right on working. On my yellow legal pad on the left side of the table, I worked front-to-back through Form A's two's-complement binary arithmetic, hexadecimal memory conversions, Boolean truth tables, and quadratic word problems in neat, vertical block columns; on the right side of the table, Katie tore through Form B's scrambled logic gates, algebraic proofs, third-normal-form relational database diagrams, and hand-written SQL join queries using her own distinct step-by-step factoring notation—ending with a final section that absurdly asked us to diagram how an HTML form passed query strings to a 1990s Perl CGI-BIN script over a dial-up intranet.

At eleven-forty-five—fifteen minutes before the lunch bell, having completed the entire two-day, twelve-hour testing battery in three hours and fifteen minutes flat—Katie and I closed the back covers of Booklet Five within ten seconds of each other, set our No. 2 pencils down on the laminate, and rolled side by side up to Ms. Hollis's desk.

"We're finished," I said, sliding Form A, my bubble sheet, my written SQL and HTML packet, and my scratch pad across her blotter as Katie laid Form B right beside mine.

Ms. Hollis stared down at the two completed stacks, her eyebrows shooting up in open skepticism. Convinced that we had either Christmas-treed the bubble sheets at random just to get out before lunch or found some clever way to copy off each other right under Mr. Miller's nose, she pulled the laminated Form A and Form B plastic grading overlays out of her locked desk drawer and lined them up over our answer sheets right in front of us while Mr. Miller stepped over to check our written database normalization and scratch pads against the instructor key.

As Ms. Hollis's forefinger moved down the columns of green bubbles on Form A and then Form B, the smug expectation drained right out of her face.

"Ninety-nine percent on Form A," Ms. Hollis murmured under her breath, blinking twice before recounting the holes on Katie's overlay, "and ninety-eight percent on Form B."

Even more damning to her cheating theory, the single multiple-choice question I had missed on Booklet One wasn't even the same question Katie had missed on Booklet Three. Suspiciously, Ms. Hollis snatched up our two yellow scratch pads and held them side by side, hunting for identical handwriting, copied formulas, or matching erasures.

"Their scratch work is completely different from page one to the end, Ms. Hollis," Mr. Miller admitted quietly, pointing to our written SQL and HTML packets. "He solved all the hexadecimal conversions by factoring through base-two, and she solved hers by direct base-sixteen division. And on the written HTML and database section, they both got one hundred percent—in fact, on Question Forty-Two, Katie wrote a three-sentence citation in the margin explaining that the test key's 1996 HTML 3.2 syntax was officially deprecated by the World Wide Web Consortium in 1999, and she wrote out both the obsolete 1996 tag from our answer key and the modern CSS2 rule so we couldn't mark it wrong."

Katie folded her hands neatly on her lap tray and looked straight across the desk at Ms. Hollis.

"And while we're on the subject of Question Forty-Two, Ms. Hollis, that entire exam battery is an embarrassment," Katie said bluntly. "Whoever wrote those five booklets hasn't updated a single page since my brother and I were in seventh grade in 1997. Half the hardware questions were asking about 28.8k dial-up modems, 1.44-megabyte floppy disks, and ISA jumper pins, and the web design section tested HTML 3.2 font and blink tags that nobody in the real world has used in almost ten years."

"If we had handed in HTML 3.2 framesets and font tags like that at the Community College of Hampton Roads," I added dryly, "our professors would have failed us on the spot. At least once we're out of Vocational Evaluation and inside Mr. Alderman's Web Applications Developer lab on Monday morning, we'll be working in an actual 2007 computer classroom instead of filling out 1990s paper packets."

Pressing her lips into a thin, bloodless line, Ms. Hollis couldn't say a word in rebuttal. With two near-perfect answer sheets, forty pages of independent scratch work, and our Monday ultimatum hanging over her desk, she uncapped her pen, stiffly signed both of our one-week Vocational Evaluation completion forms, and cleared us to start the Web Applications Developer class on Monday morning.

Saturday, March 10, 2007, 1:00 PM — Still Stuck on Level 2 in Barton Hall & Hating the Yellow Hall Pass Rule

"Look at this yellow slip of paper, Nate," Katie whispered in disgust on Saturday afternoon as we sat parked wheel-to-wheel in the Barton Hall lobby holding two signed yellow paper Level 2 Hall Passes while we waited by the glass doors for the Center recreation van. "We rushed the entire two-week Voc Eval in one single week so we could start our Web Applications Developer class on Monday morning, and we're still stuck right here in Barton Hall on Level 2!"

"Because moving over to Cantor Hall is part of earning Level 3, and nobody who's only been on campus for six days has been here long enough to earn Level 3, let alone Level 4," I muttered, looking down at the counselor's signature on my yellow paper pass. "Back home in Norfolk or Virginia Beach, if we want to go buy snacks or browse computer books at Chapters & Co., we just roll out our front door to the nearest CVTA bus stop, pay our fare, and go wherever we please like normal adults. Up here in Barton Hall, a Level 2 client can't even roll past the front gates on Roosevelt Avenue to catch the local VATS shuttle bus between Staunton, Fishersville, and Waynesboro without begging the dorm office for a signed yellow Hall Pass stating where we're going and what minute we'll be back."

"And if you don't want to wait two hours on the shoulder of Route 250 for the VATS bus on a Saturday," Katie added, gesturing toward the recreation clipboard hanging outside the lobby office where students had to sign up for chaperoned van trips to

The Spot recreation hangout or the Waynesboro ValueMart, “you have to sign up for a chaperoned Center van ride! We will be twenty-two years old in four weeks, Nate. We have associate degrees, we run our own regional transit website, and we had to get a signed Hall Pass from a dorm counselor just to ride four miles down the road to buy laundry detergent and ginger ale at ValueMart—the exact store Ms. Hollis thought I should stand at the door and greet shoppers for!”

“And tonight makes our seventh night in a row being forced down separate hallways for the eleven-o’clock bed check,” I whispered back, lacing my fingers tightly through hers across our armrests as the white Center van pulled up to the curb outside. “Let’s see what Mr. Alderman’s PHP class looks like on Monday morning, Katie—because I am already sick to death of this place.”

Starting Web Apps While Stuck in Barton Hall, Sleeping in the Closet, & The Chickenshit Report

Part 1: Starting Web Apps While Stuck on Level 2 in Barton Hall, Quantum OS 2000 Professional, & Meeting Tina, Jim, and Sheila

Date: 2007-03-12 at 08:00 America/New_York

Monday, March 12, 2007, 8:00 AM — “Death Before Dishonor, NOTHING Before Coffee!”, Adult Bathroom Rules, & Sitting Together in Class

“Death before dishonor, NOTHING before coffee!” Katie read aloud with a grin at eight o’clock on Monday morning as we rolled our joystick-outfitted wheelchairs down the 1970s concrete-block corridor of the Information Technology wing and paused outside the interior office window of the Computer Hardware lab right next door to our classroom, where a bold vinyl sticker was plastered across the glass above a gurgling twelve-cup commercial coffee brewer.

“That’s Mr. Culpepper’s office window,” a middle-aged student with a salt-and-pepper beard chuckled, stepping out of the adjoining hardware doorway holding an empty ceramic mug while half a dozen hardware students hovered around the counter waiting for the amber pot to finish dripping. “He teaches the Computer Hardware and network cabling lab next door, and I’m telling you right now, that classroom never gets started for the day until the coffee is brewed and ready. Those guys swear by their morning coffee.”

“More for you guys, then,” I laughed as Katie and I pulled two cold cans of ginger ale out of our backpack side pockets. “Neither my sister nor I can stand the taste of coffee.”

“You two must be Nathaniel and Katie Prairie,” our Web Applications Developer instructor, Mr. Alderman, said with a welcoming smile, stepping out of the adjacent computer lab doorway as Mr. Culpepper gave us a friendly wave through his sticker-adorned office window next door. Mr. Alderman gestured toward the long double workstation table near the front of our lab where two wide wheelchair bays sat side by side. “I saw how the two of you tore through the entire Voc Eval coding packet in a single sitting on Thursday morning. Take those two stations right there together—you’ve got plenty of room to park your chairs wheel-to-wheel.”

“Thank you, Mr. Alderman,” Katie said, exhaling the first genuine breath of relief either of us had taken since arriving in Fishersville as we steered into the adjacent bays and locked our manual wheel brakes side by side. “After Ms. Hollis spent last week trying to split us up to opposite corners of the break room, we half-expected another lecture about sitting apart.”

“Not in my classroom, and not in Mr. Culpepper’s lab next door either,” Mr. Alderman said firmly, leaning against the instructor podium while the aroma of Mr. Culpepper’s fresh-brewed coffee drifted through the open connecting doorway and Katie and I popped the tabs on our cold ginger ales. “We treat our students like grown adults on a real job site. You sit where you work best, and one more thing so you know you’re not in Voc Eval anymore: in this classroom, you never have to raise your hand or ask permission to go to the bathroom. Simply tell me you’re heading to the restroom so I know where you are, and go. How’s Barton Hall treating you two so far?”

“Honestly, we’re already counting the hours on our fingers,” I admitted as Katie and I unzipped our backpacks. “Even though we rushed Voc Eval in one week so we could start your class today, we’re still stuck over in Barton Hall on Level 2 because moving to Cantor Hall is part of earning Level 3, and nobody stays long enough in seven days to earn Level 3 or Level 4. That makes eight straight nights of being forced down separate men’s and women’s wings at eleven o’clock with flashlights shining in our faces, plus begging for signed yellow paper Hall Passes just to step off campus.”

“Ah, watch out for the overnight dorm log over there,” Mr. Alderman said with a dry chuckle, shaking his head. “Half the night staff in the dorms love writing down every petty little thing they can find on what the teachers around here call the Chickenshit Report. Just keep your heads down in my lab and you’ll be fine.”

9:00 AM — Quantum OS 2000 Professional, Meeting Tina, Jim, and Sheila, & Refusing to Be Pushed Around

“All right, everyone, now that Mr. Culpepper’s coffee pot next door is finally done brewing and the building is officially awake, go ahead and hit the power switches on the desktop towers so you can see what the Commonwealth left us with,” Mr. Alderman called out at nine o’clock once the rest of the class had settled into their seats.

Katie and I pressed the round plastic power buttons on the two beige Commonwealth of Virginia property-tagged desktop towers sitting on our table. As the bulky CRT monitors flickered to life with a high-pitched static hum, both of us stared in disbelief at the splash screen.

“Quantum OS 2000 Professional?” Katie whispered, blinking at the screen. “Nate, it’s March of 2007! This operating system is seven years old!”

I clicked the Start menu to open a command prompt and check the local PHP configuration—and immediately hit a glaring red system dialog box: ADMINISTRATOR ACCESS DENIED — CONTACT VITA SYSTEM ADMINISTRATOR. Not only was the operating system seven years out of date, but VITA—the Virginia Information Technology Agency in Richmond—had locked the machines down with group-policy permissions so suffocating that a student login couldn’t install up-to-date software or a modern web browser, couldn’t edit a local PHP configuration file, couldn’t start or stop a local web server service, and couldn’t even open the control panel.

Across the aisle from our wheelchairs, the middle-aged man with the salt-and-pepper beard who had been waiting on Mr. Culpepper’s coffee pot earlier tapped his keyboard twice, stared at the locked-down Quantum OS 2000 Professional desktop, and let out a dry laugh. “Well, if the Commonwealth wants us to build database-driven web applications on these dinosaurs, I hope they’re planning to give us until the year 2030.”

“Where are you from?” I asked, hearing the unmistakable Tidewater cadence in his voice.

“Virginia Beach,” he grinned, setting his mug down and reaching across the aisle to shake my hand and then Katie’s. “I’m Jim. Spent twenty years working on computer hardware and network cabling down at the Oceanfront and Lynnhaven before my back gave out and Voc Rehab sent me up the mountain to retrain.”

“No way—we’re from Virginia Beach too!” Katie beamed. “We grew up in Kempsville and went to Northwood High School and the Community College of Hampton Roads before we lived in West Ocean View!”

At the two workstations immediately to Katie’s right, two middle-aged women turned their chairs around with warm smiles. The woman sitting closest to Katie was short and petite, Caucasian, with straight jet-black hair and sharp eyes behind her glasses; beside her sat a cheerful woman with a sketchpad full of interface wireframes.

“I’m Tina, from up Route 340 in Luray,” the petite woman in glasses said, shaking Katie’s hand and then mine, “and this is Sheila—she commutes down I-81 from Harrisonburg every morning and does all our digital graphics and UI layouts. While half the twenty-year-olds in the dorms spend all day screaming at each other in the cafeteria, the three of us actually came here to build software.”

“And there is only one way any of us writes real PHP and SQL in this room,” Sheila added, sliding the beige state keyboard all the way to the back of her desk against the CRT monitor.

Right beside Katie, Tina unzipped her shoulder bag, pulled out her own sleek personal laptop, and set it right on the desk in front of the useless state keyboard—alongside a well-thumbed, spiral-bound copy of the Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center Student Handbook bristling with sticky notes.

“Every single student in this class—Jim, Sheila, Sarah, Amanda, Bryan, Sean, and me—brings our own personal laptop and runs a local web server, PHP 5, and an SQL database on our own hard drive,” Tina told us plainly, adjusting her glasses. “Technically the Center rules say no personal computers in class, but Mr. Alderman and the old vocational administrator let us do it because they know VITA locked these state towers down so tight you can’t code a single script on them.”

“Wait—why do you have sticky notes all through the student handbook?” Katie asked, glancing at Tina’s spiral booklet.

Tina grinned behind her glasses. “Because I’m short, I stay in the dorms here four nights a week before I drive my compact sedan home to Luray every Friday afternoon at three-thirty sharp, and I don’t let anyone at this center push me around. I tell it like it is straight to their faces, and the RRC staff hate it—but they can’t write me up or touch me because I never break a single rule in this book. I heard down the hall how the two of you rushed Voc Eval in one week flat and told off Ms. Hollis when she tried to split you up at social break. Good for you. Half the staff here think a clipboard—or seeing rubber push-handles on the back of a wheelchair—gives them a license to boss you around. Follow the handbook to the letter and call them on their nonsense, and there’s not a thing they can do to you.”

At four o’clock that very afternoon, when class let out and Tina walked over to the Barton Hall lobby with us to drop off a PHP reference binder before heading to her car, we saw Tina’s method in action firsthand.

Katie and I rolled side by side up to the Barton Hall front counter, laid our signed yellow paper Level 2 Hall Passes on the blotter to log our departure for the VATS shuttle bus into Waynesboro, and turned our wheelchairs toward the automatic glass doors—just as a prickly afternoon residential supervisor named Mr. Vance marched out of the inner office and stepped right in front of our front casters with his arms crossed.

“Hold on right there, you two,” Mr. Vance barked, reaching his right hand out to grab the rear rubber push-handle of my manual frame as if he were about to wheel me backward away from the exit. “Where do you think you’re rolling off to at four o’clock? You two are still Level 2 clients here in Barton Hall!”

“First, take your hand off my brother’s wheelchair push-handle right now,” Katie said sharply, locking her joystick brakes alongside mine without backing up a millimeter. “Second, we know we’re still Level 2, Mr. Vance, which is why our counselor signed our yellow Hall Passes at three-thirty and they are sitting right there on the desk blotter in front of you.”

“Under Section Three of the residential handbook,” I said evenly, pointing down at the two signed yellow slips clipped to the desk ledger, “Level 2 clients who have completed their afternoon training block and hold a signed Hall Pass are permitted off campus until eight o’clock in the evening. Just because our wheelchairs have manual push-handles on the back so they can fold into a car trunk doesn’t mean staff get to grab them or push us around when we’ve followed your rules to the letter.”

Standing right beside Katie’s chair with her car keys in her hand, Tina peered up at Mr. Vance through her glasses, her jet-black hair framing a look of cool, unapologetic amusement.

“They’ve got you dead to rights on page twelve of the handbook, Mr. Vance,” Tina said bluntly in front of half the lobby. “Their yellow passes are signed in ink, they logged their departure time, and neither of them is breaking a single rule in this building. If you keep grabbing his chair and blocking the doorway when they’ve complied with Center policy, the only person violating the handbook here is you.”

Mr. Vance’s face flushed crimson from his collar to his hairline. He glared at Tina and then down at Katie and me, searching desperately for something to cite us for—and finding nothing at all, he let go of my push-handle and stepped stiffly out of the doorway.

Tuesday, March 13, 2007, 9:30 AM — Coding on Personal Laptops & Standing Up to the New VITA-Obsessed Administrator

“Mr. Alderman,” a sharp voice rang out from the doorway of the Web Applications Developer classroom at nine-thirty on Tuesday morning, “why are all of these students using personal laptops instead of the Center-provided computers?”

Katie, Tina, Sheila, Jim, and I all paused with our fingers hovering over our personal laptop keyboards and looked toward the center aisle. Standing there in a pressed navy suit with a clipboard tucked against her arm was the brand-new vocational division administrator who had started on campus that week—frowning down the row of open personal laptops sitting in front of the dark, powered-off state CRT monitors.

“Because, ma’am,” Katie spoke up politely from her wheelchair before Mr. Alderman even had to step around the podium, “the Center-provided computers on these desks are horribly outdated. They’re still running Quantum OS 2000 Professional, and VITA has the permissions locked down so hard that we can’t install up-to-date software, configure a PHP server, or run a local database.”

The new administrator marched over to our front workstation table, looking down at Katie and me in our wheelchairs as if she expected the two of us to shrink back and shut our laptop lids. “VITA has assured my office that every workstation on the Commonwealth network is configured with standard agency software and mandatory security lockdowns,” she said sharply. “You are clients here, not the IT department. Close those personal laptops right now and use the computers VITA provided.”

Neither Katie nor I touched our laptop hinges.

“No, ma’am, we won’t do that,” I said calmly from my chair, meeting her stare without blinking. “Our state vocational rehabilitation plans specifically fund us to complete the Commonwealth’s accredited Web Applications Developer syllabus in PHP 5 and relational database design. If you force us onto seven-year-old Quantum OS 2000 Professional machines where VITA has blocked local web servers and command prompts, you are preventing us from completing the state-mandated curriculum.”

Right beside Katie’s chair, Tina stood up to her full petite height, pushed her glasses up the bridge of her nose, opened her spiral-bound handbook, and looked the new administrator straight in the eye.

“Let me tell you how it is, since somebody needs to say it plainly,” Tina said, her voice steady and fearless while Sheila and Jim stood behind us. “None of us is breaking a single VITA network rule—not one of these personal laptops is plugged into the Commonwealth’s ethernet jacks. VITA configured those beige dinosaurs on the desks for someone typing memos in a seven-year-old word processor, not for web application developers. We need computers with up-to-date software, and we need permissions not to be locked down so hard that we can’t even start a local web server or edit a configuration file. Unless VITA is going to walk in here today and install modern software with developer permissions on those towers, closing our laptops means shutting down the entire class.”

“And if you shut down the class,” Katie added evenly from her wheelchair, reaching across our armrests to hold my hand, “my brother and I—and everyone else at these desks—will be happy to call our regional Vocational Rehabilitation counselors before lunch and explain that the new administration in Fishersville won’t let us write code.”

The new administrator stared from Tina’s unblinking glasses to Katie’s and my twin wheelchairs. Because not a single personal laptop in the room was plugged into the state ethernet wall jacks, we weren’t violating a single VITA network regulation, and she knew Mr. Alderman, Mr. Culpepper next door, and the regional counselors would back us up. Muttering under her breath about “consulting with VITA compliance,” she turned on her heel and walked out the door, leaving the five of us to exchange satisfied grins and go right back to coding on our personal laptops: Katie, Tina, and I writing the PHP back-end logic, Sheila designing the interface graphics, and Jim keeping everyone’s hardware humming.

Part 2: Emergency in the Therapeutic Pool, Caught Sleeping Together in a Closet, Calling the Staffer’s Bluff, & The Chickenshit Report

Date: 2007-03-13 at 16:15 America/New_York

Tuesday, March 13, 2007, 4:15 PM — Emergency at the Therapeutic Pool & The Towel Showdown

“I told you to leave her alone!” I shouted across the ninety-two-degree water of the indoor therapeutic pool at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center, projecting my voice intentionally loud so the recreation staffer sitting behind the office glass would hear me.

Across the warm water from where our two joystick-outfitted wheelchairs sat parked at the top of the sloped therapeutic pool entry ramp, Chris—an aggressive student from the IT class cohort who had been pestering Katie since Monday morning and refused to accept that my twin sister had zero interest in dating him—smirked and wading-stepped closer.

“Come on, Nate, let’s swim up to the shallow ramp,” Katie said tightly, turning in the warm water to get away from him.

We pushed off through the buoyant water toward the shallow ramp together, and Chris plowed straight through the water right behind us. Before I could pivot between them, he lunged forward and slammed both hands down into the water right in front of Katie’s face—striking her hard across the bridge of her nose and cheek while his flailing fingers caught and tore the front piece of her two-piece swimsuit top.

Katie gasped, clutched onto my left forearm with one hand while clapping her other hand over her face, and burst into sobs.

My heart dropped into my stomach. Katie never cried over splashes or arguments; if Katie was crying, she was hurt.

Wrapping my arm around her waist in the buoyant water, I guided her immediately up the submerged shallow ramp to our parked wheelchairs at the edge of the wet tile deck and helped her transfer into her seat while I pulled myself into mine right beside her. When I gently eased her hand back half an inch to check her face, I saw two things at the exact same second: Chris's hand had split the thin skin right across the bony bridge of her nose while rupturing the blood vessels inside her nostrils so bright red blood was pouring steadily from her nose, and the front piece of her swimsuit top had been ripped away in the water, leaving her chest bare while both of her hands had to stay pressed tightly over her bleeding nostrils.

"Get me Student Health and Campus Security!" I roared at the top of my lungs across the natatorium. "My sister's nose is bleeding!"

Since Katie was in no condition to speak with both of her hands occupied holding her bleeding nose, I angled my wheelchair right in front of hers and leaned forward to use my own hands to cover up my sister's bare breasts and shield her modesty on the open pool deck while we waited for someone to bring a towel.

Instead of grabbing a towel from the rack by the wall, the poolside staffer walked over with a clipboard in his hand and frowned at me.

"You know I'm going to have to report you for inappropriate contact," the staffer said, staring straight at my hands covering my sister's chest while blood dripped between her fingers onto the wet tile.

"Either report me or get a towel to cover my sister's dignity!" I retorted angrily, not giving a damn what he thought while my sister sat bleeding and exposed in front of the pool.

Staring at the blood running down Katie's wrists and her torn swimsuit top floating by the gutter, it finally dawned on the staffer why my hands were covering her chest. He hurried over to the rack and brought back a thick white bath towel just as the Recreational Therapy supervisor rushed out with a walkie-talkie crackling that both Student Health and RRC Campus Police were on the way.

Only when that dry towel was wrapped securely around Katie's chest and shoulders did I let go.

Seconds later, two Student Health nurses pushed through the double doors and immediately pressed a sterile gauze pack over Katie's bleeding nose and swollen cheek, while a Campus Police officer pulled out his notepad to take a formal written statement from me and three other students who had witnessed Chris lunge at her in the water.

Over the edge of the bloody gauze pack, Katie fixed the poolside staffer who had threatened to write me up with a furious glare.

"You're going to write up my brother for trying to cover my boobs while no one wanted to get a towel or something?" she stammered thickly past the bandage.

The staffer looked down at his shoes without a word as the Recreational Therapy supervisor ordered everyone out of the water, closing the natatorium so maintenance could scrub the tile coping with a one-to-ten bleach solution, shock-chlorinate the ninety-two-degree water to four parts per million, and run a full sixty-minute filtration turnover hold.

While Student Health escorted Katie across the walkway to the clinic in the Bates-Harding Building, one of Katie's female friends from our class hurried into the women's locker room and brought all of Katie's dry clothes and backpack out to me. Stacking her bag on the seat of her wheelchair, I rolled both chairs over to the Student Health waiting room and sat stubbornly outside the exam door until evening —refusing to be more than ten feet away from my sister while she was hurt.

7:30 PM – 11:25 PM — Closing Time at the Rec Hall, Locking the Seasonal Closet From the Inside in Street Clothes, & Accused of Having Sex

"I don't want to leave your side," Katie whispered at seven-thirty that evening as the Student Health clinic door opened and she rolled out wearing her swimsuit bottom and a worn-out oversized loaner T-shirt. Once the clinic nurses had finally gotten the heavy bleeding inside her nostrils to clot and stop, they had had to pull the split skin across the bony bridge of her nose together with sterile MedStrip wound-closure strips and tape a protective white gauze-and-paper-tape dressing across the bridge of her nose and swollen right cheek, instructing her to keep the MedStrips and white tape bandage dry and in place across her nose for a full seven days so the split bridge wouldn't reopen. Reaching across our armrests for my hand as we rolled toward Barton Hall in the gathering dusk, she started sobbing again. "I don't give a damn about the Level 2 dorm rule… please don't leave me tonight, Nate."

"We used to live together!" she stammered as we paused outside the Barton Hall entrance so she could run into her room just long enough to change out of her damp swimwear into dry street clothes—blue jeans, sneakers, and a zip-up fleece hoodie. "We used to share a bed! Hell, we would sleep in closets together!"

Looking at the fresh white gauze taped across my trembling sister's swollen nose after eight straight nights of forced separation in Barton Hall, I made up my mind on the spot. We weren't going to try rolling down the dorm hallways in pajamas carrying pillows and blankets off our beds—that would be a dead giveaway to every staff member on duty. Instead, once Katie came back out in her dry jeans and hoodie, the two of us rolled over to the campus Rec Hall to spend the evening together in a corner booth where no one could separate us.

At ten-forty that night, the Rec Hall staffer flicked the overhead lights twice and called out across the game tables that it was five minutes until ten-forty-five—the mandatory departure time for all Level 2 clients to head back to Barton Hall ahead of the eleven-o'clock curfew check, while Level 3 and Level 4 clients from Cantor Hall were allowed to stay until the Rec Hall closed at eleven sharp.

Still dressed in our full daytime street clothes and shoes, Katie and I looked at each other and nodded without saying a word. First, both of us went to the bathroom one last time so neither of us would have to open a door in the middle of the night.

When we rolled back out of the restrooms at ten-forty-four, while the staffer at the Rec Hall front counter was busy collecting billiard balls and board games and the other Level 2 students were filing out the front glass doors toward Barton Hall, Katie and I checked over our shoulders to make sure no one was looking—and slipped quietly down a darkened hallway off the rear of the Rec Hall.

At the end of that darkened hallway stood the heavy solid-wood door to the seasonal storage closet—a walk-in closet big enough to fit both of our wheelchairs inside out of sight.

I reached out and tried the brass doorknob. To our relief, it turned smoothly—it was unlocked!

Immediately, Katie and I rolled both of our joystick-outfitted wheelchairs all the way inside the dark closet, pulled the door shut behind us, and twisted the interior thumb-turn lock until it clicked, locking the door from the inside.

In the quiet darkness, smelling of cedar and cardboard boxes, we clicked off our wheelchair power switches and felt around the shelves and floor for anything soft. Packed along the back wall were lumpy canvas storage bags stuffed with spare winter coats, folded fabric stage curtains, and foam cushions. Still wearing our full street clothes, jeans, hoodies, and sneakers, we pulled two lumpy bundles onto the linoleum floor to use as makeshift pillows, spread a thick folded stage curtain over our shoulders as a makeshift blanket, and transferred out of our wheelchairs onto the floor.

Wrapping both of our arms tightly around each other in the dark, Katie tucked her head beneath my chin with a long, shaky exhale. Confident that nobody would ever find us locked inside a back seasonal closet, we started to drift off to sleep in our street clothes.

At eleven-twenty-five, just as I was sliding into sleep with my arms around my sister, the sound of footsteps echoed down the darkened Rec Hall hallway outside our closet.

Both of us went completely still in the dark.

The footsteps stopped right outside our door. Someone grabbed the outer brass doorknob and tried to turn it—rattle, rattle—finding it locked from the inside.

Katie and I held our breath and remained dead quiet, not moving a muscle in the dark.

Then, right outside the wood, we heard the metallic jingle of a master key ring. A key scraped into the outside lock cylinder, the bolt clicked back as someone unlocked the door, and the solid-wood door swung wide open as a blinding flashlight beam swept past our two parked wheelchairs and shone straight down onto the two of us huddled in our street clothes on the floor.

“Aha! I knew it!” the night supervisor barked, glaring down at us while the Rec Hall staffer stood behind him in the hallway. “What the hell do you two think you’re doing locking yourselves inside a dark closet to have sex?! You know the Center rule—if two clients are caught having sex anywhere on this campus, at any time, both of you get kicked out of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center!”

We had already heard plenty of stories from other students during our first week and a half about clients sneaking off to have sex being a rampant thing all over campus, and the second the supervisor barked “I knew it!” without even pausing to look at us, we figured this back closet in the Rec Hall was probably one of the places where clients got caught hooking up.

Neither Katie nor I shrank back an inch. Pushing the makeshift curtain off our shoulders as we transferred back up into our wheelchairs in our full street clothes and sneakers, both of us went straight back at the night supervisor at full volume.

“Have sex?!” I roared in disgust, staring at him like he had lost his mind. “Are you out of your sick mind?! First of all, she’s my twin sister! Second, look at us—we’re wearing our full street clothes, jeans, hoodies, and shoes! We locked ourselves in here to sleep using lumpy bags as pillows because my sister got her nose broken open in your pool this afternoon and your stupid Level 2 dorm rules wouldn’t let us stay together!”

“Look at my face!” Katie snapped furiously, pointing straight at the swollen purple bruise on her cheek and the white medical tape across her broken nose. “My nose was broken open in your therapeutic pool five hours ago by a creep in our class, your poolside staffer tried to write my brother up for covering my dignity when nobody brought a towel, and when we just wanted a quiet closet where my brother could hold me so I wouldn’t be alone all night, you unlock the door and accuse twin brother and sister of having sex?!”

“I don’t care what story you give me—locking yourselves inside a dark seasonal closet together and skipping the eleven-o’clock curfew check is grounds for expulsion!” the night supervisor barked, shaking his clipboard in our faces. “Keep yelling at me like that, both of you, and I will have you kicked out of this Center and sent home right now!”

Katie and I called his bluff on the spot.

“Do it! Kick us out right now!” I fired right back at him without blinking, unlocking my wheelchair brakes and rolling straight out of the closet into the Rec Hall corridor. “It’s eleven-twenty-five at night—don’t wait until morning! Walk right down the hall to the Rec Hall’s front-desk telephone and call our father in Alexandria right now! Tell him to get in his pickup truck and come pick us up tonight!”

“Go on, walk over to the Rec Hall desk phone and call our Dad in Alexandria right now!” Katie dared him at the top of her lungs, rolling right out beside me and pointing down the hallway toward the front counter. “Wake him up at eleven-twenty-five, tell him you’re kicking us out, and then explain to him why my nose is bandaged! We’re ready to leave this place right now—we’ll go back across to Barton Hall and pack our suitcases this second!”

The night supervisor froze dead in his tracks with his pen in the air.

He stared from my face to Katie’s bandaged nose, realizing in an instant that we weren’t scared teenagers begging not to get expelled—we were dead serious and ready to roll across to our rooms and pack our bags that very minute. Within three seconds, every ounce of bluster drained out of his face, and he backed all the way down.

“Nobody is calling your father tonight, and nobody is getting kicked out,” the night supervisor muttered stiffly, lowering his clipboard and refusing to take a single step toward the Rec Hall desk telephone. “Your vocational counselor is off work tomorrow on Wednesday. I am putting a residential write-up in the overnight log for missing eleven-o'clock bed check, and your counselor will speak to the two of you about this on Thursday morning when she returns. Now get across to Barton Hall and go to your assigned beds."

Only when we were back in our separate rooms in Barton Hall ten minutes later with our laptop webcams open on our nightstands so we could watch over each other through the screen did Katie speak quietly into her microphone.

"Wait a second, Nate," Katie whispered, frowning thoughtfully past the white tape across her nose. "Everybody on campus knows the rule: if two students are caught having sex anywhere at any time, both of them get kicked out of the Center automatically. He automatically assumed that's what we were doing and threatened to kick us out on the spot—so why did he back down the very second we told him to call Dad in Alexandria and said we were ready to leave tonight?"

"Because he realized kicking us out wasn't a punishment to us—we actually wanted to leave," I said quietly.

"I think it's more than that, Nate," Katie said slowly, her sharp eyes narrowing on the screen. "Think about how hard Voc Eval pushed to keep us here for two full weeks, and how fast that supervisor just panicked when he saw two full-time Web Applications students ready to pack their suitcases in Week Two. I bet the Center's funding from the state is tied to how many dorm beds and classroom seats they keep filled. They only kick people out when they think you'll beg to stay—the second he saw we'd gladly walk out the door tonight, he backed down so they wouldn't lose two seats."

"Whether it's their headcount funding or covering their own behinds over the pool, we now know their threats are hollow," I whispered back.

"I just need to be hugged," Katie murmured toward the webcam, her bandaged nose and swollen cheek catching the glow of her screen.

"I know," I said softly, keeping my hand resting beside the camera lens until her eyelids drooped, "and I'll be waiting right outside your suite door first thing in the morning. Goodnight, Katie."

Wednesday, March 14, 2007, 8:30 AM — The Bates-Harding Office & "I LET HIM COVER MY DIGNITY!"

"I'm still so upset," Katie whispered in my ear at quarter to eight on Wednesday morning as we met right outside her women's-wing suite door and I pulled her into a tight morning hug across our armrests.

"I understand," I whispered back, rubbing her shoulder. Hoping to coax even a tiny smile out of her, I asked, "You ready to go eat some more garbage?"

Katie giggled just a bit against my collar, though when I started to ease back from the hug, she held on tightly to my jacket sleeves and refused to let go—making it crystal clear without words: please don't let go.

As we finally rolled side by side past the Barton Hall front desk toward the dining hall breezeway, the morning desk clerk looked up from the overnight binder and tapped a pink slip of paper. "Nathaniel, Katie—just so you know, your regular vocational counselor has her scheduled day off today, so your disciplinary write-up meeting for getting caught in the hallway closet at eleven o'clock last night is on her calendar for Thursday morning. Also, check the lobby board after dinner tonight—housing is running the mid-month dormitory room reassignments this evening."

Neither of us cared about Thursday's closet write-up meeting—and as soon as we finished breakfast at eight-thirty, an administrative runner paged both of us over to the student-services duty supervisor's office in the Bates-Harding Building regarding Tuesday afternoon's incident at the pool.

Rolling through the wood-paneled office door beside Katie, I took one look at the printout sitting on the duty supervisor's desk—the morning Chickenshit Report—and saw the poolside staffer's entry from Tuesday afternoon literally accusing me of "fondling Katie's bare breasts while she was in distress, after having been assaulted and her swimsuit top destroyed by the person who assaulted her."

Katie rolled her eyes and growled across the desk, "Delete that from the record! I told him to cover my boobs while we waited for someone to get a damn towel! None of this shit would've happened if that boy didn't cause me a nosebleed in the first place!"

My sister was furious—Katie never cussed like that in front of staff—and she kept right on going: "And I don't care if you call our Dad! He would tell you himself that my brother acted protectively in covering them!"

Having riled herself all the way up on top of Tuesday's pool assault and getting dragged out of the closet at eleven o'clock the night before, Katie's nervous system overloaded all at once, her voice cutting out as she descended straight into a full autistic meltdown.

Instinctively, I steered my wheelchair flush against hers, locked my brakes, and held her tightly in my arms while she trembled against my shoulder.

The duty supervisor looked into Katie's blank, overloaded eyes, seeing immediately that the only reason she had gone completely silent was because her autistic brain was in a full sensory shutdown.

"Let me try something," the supervisor said quietly, pressing the intercom button on his desk phone. "Could we please get a cup of water brought in for Katie?"

Turning back to the two of us while I held my trembling sister, he spoke in a calm, steady voice. "You really care about her, don't you, Nathaniel? No, I don't think you were touching her inappropriately. I think you were acting on instinct and shielding her from further humiliation while you waited for a towel to cover her up, and while she was busy trying to stop her nose from bleeding until help could arrive. I have the medical report from the nurses in Student Health right here on my desk that says the exact same thing."

When the secretary brought in a small paper cup of cool water and Katie slowly took a few sips, her breathing steadied. Reaching across the wooden desk, Katie pulled a yellow legal pad toward her wheelchair, picked up a thick black marker, and wrote down in firm block letters:

I LET HIM COVER MY DIGNITY!

“Katie, I’m agreeing with you,” the supervisor said gently, tapping his keyboard and deleting the Tuesday afternoon poolside entry from my record on the spot. “That pool-deck entry is gone. Your regular counselor will still see the two of you tomorrow morning at ten o’clock regarding last night’s eleven-o’clock seasonal closet write-up, since she’s out of the office today, but as far as yesterday afternoon at the pool goes, you did the right thing looking out for your sister, Nathaniel.”

“Back home in our apartment, we are at each other’s side twenty-four hours a day,” I told him bluntly before we unlocked our brakes to roll over to Mr. Alderman’s classroom. “In case there’s a meltdown or an emergency in the middle of the night, the other one is right there. We are not used to being apart—and we are not staying somewhere that treats keeping my sister safe like a rule violation.”

Fifteen minutes later, when we rolled into the Web Applications Developer lab and told Tina, Sheila, and Jim that the poolside report had been deleted—while our ten-o’clock disciplinary meeting over getting locked in the seasonal closet was still on our counselor’s calendar for Thursday morning—Tina immediately flipped open her sticky-noted Student Handbook to the residential discipline section and lowered her voice behind her glasses.

“Watch yourselves at ten o’clock tomorrow morning, you two,” Tina warned us seriously. “Up until last night, the two of you were driving the staff crazy by bending the rules and lawyering the handbook without technically breaking a single written policy. Skipping the ten-forty-five Rec Hall departure and locking yourselves inside that seasonal closet after curfew, though, is the first time you actually broke a written rule. And since the night supervisor already saw last night that threatening to kick you out doesn’t scare you, they’re going to try to hit you tomorrow morning with a Level 1 restriction.”

“What’s a Level 1 restriction?” Katie asked, frowning past the white tape across her nose.

“Level 2 is where every new student starts in Barton Hall—you can go anywhere on campus freely without signing out, and if you leave campus you either need a signed yellow paper Pass or you sign up at the Rec Hall desk for a Center-sponsored trip to places like The Spot or ValueMart, while Level 3 over in Cantor Hall only has to sign out to leave campus and Level 4 can come and go off campus as they please without any pass or sign-out,” Tina explained, tapping page eighteen of her handbook. “Level 1 is the disciplinary punishment tier. If they demote you to Level 1 tomorrow morning, they strip away all of your off-campus Pass and trip privileges for up to thirty days so you can’t even ride the VATS bus or leave the campus gates, lock you into your separate dorm wings right after supper with flashlight bed checks every thirty minutes, and force you to sign a written Behavioral Contract ordering mandatory separation during meals, breaks, and recreation hours. And under Center rules, if you refuse to sign a Level 1 Behavioral Contract, they threaten to expel you for non-compliance and call your family to come pick you up.”

Katie and I looked at each other across our wheelchair armrests, and the exact same fire lit up in both of our eyes.

“We will never sign a Level 1 restriction or a separation contract,” I promised Tina flatly. “Not a single word of it.”

“I dare anyone in that counseling office to try to make us sign a piece of paper ordering my brother and me to stay apart or locking us into separate wings after supper!” Katie said fiercely, her hand gripping mine across our armrests. “And if they tell us that refusing to sign their Level 1 contract means we’re kicked out of the Center and they’re calling our father in Alexandria to come pick us up, we’ll look them straight in the eye and say, ‘Go ahead!’ Dad will be in his pickup truck heading down Interstate 81 before they even hang up the phone.”

The Dormitory Room Mix-Up, Tina’s Daybed in Luray, & Leaving RRC After Twelve Days

Part 1: The Dormitory Room Mix-Up, Blind Red-Tape Room Reassignments, & A Sleepless Night for Natalie

Date: 2007-03-14 at 21:15 America/New_York

Wednesday, March 14, 2007, 9:15 PM — When Red Tape Blindly Follows a Scrambled Room Roster

“What are you doing in here, Tina?” I asked in surprise at nine-fifteen on Wednesday night as the door to my men’s dormitory room in Barton Hall clicked open and in walked our short, petite classmate with her glasses and straight jet-black hair, holding a newly issued plastic room keycard and an overnight bag.

Tina pushed her glasses up the bridge of her nose and held up the white plastic keycard with a look of sheer disbelief. “I thought something was fishy when the front desk handed me this keycard ten minutes ago and told me my room had been reassigned over here to Barton Hall.”

Sitting in my wheelchair at my desk with my laptop webcam connected to Katie’s room on the women’s wing, I swiveled my laptop screen toward the doorway so the camera faced Tina. “Katie, look who just walked into my dorm room with a keycard.”

Over the live video window, Katie’s eyes went wide behind the white tape across her nose. Before Tina could say another word, the outer corridor door opened again and two more classmates from our Web Applications Developer cohort, Jim and Amanda, stepped into our hallway holding their own reassigned keycards and printed room slips.

“Wait a second—they moved Amanda and me out of Cantor Hall into the Barton Hall men’s wing too?” Tina said, comparing the printed room numbers stapled to their keycards against Jim’s slip. “Look at this roster sheet. The computer printout scrambled the men’s and women’s room numbers across the whole campus, and because of the ridiculous red tape around here, the front-desk staff just followed the printout blindly and handed out the keys anyway—putting women in men’s rooms and men in women’s wings without once using their brains to question the sheet!”

“Thank goodness I go home to Luray every Friday afternoon,” Tina added, shaking her head in disgust, “because four nights a week of this bureaucracy is already pushing my limit.”

“What’s going on over there?” Katie asked nervously through my laptop speakers. “Do not close this chat window, Nate. I’d come over to your room right now, except I need to stay by my things in case someone comes to my room.”

“Makes sense,” Tina said, gesturing toward the doorway. “And nobody at that front desk is pushing us around tonight. Come on, Nate, Jim—let’s roll out to the lobby counter and get this sorted out right now.”

Rolling out to the Barton Hall lobby counter with my open laptop balanced on my lap tray, we found the only evening dorm staffer on duty: Herbert—whom every student on campus called Herb because he was the one genuinely decent staffer who organized weekend video-game tournaments in the lounge, even though he had zero administrative authority to override housing red tape.

“I can’t even get through to my boss on the phone because it’s after hours, and the system locked me out of the housing database so I can’t check the master roster either,” Herb explained, holding up both hands helplessly behind the wooden counter as Tina tapped the scrambled room-assignment ledger. “Now, all of you in the IT class, I know you don’t break the rules—”

“Thanks, Herb,” Katie said through my laptop speaker.

At that exact second, on my laptop screen, the door to Katie’s dorm room on the women’s wing swung open.

“Katie, do you mind pointing the laptop toward the door?” Herb asked, leaning over the counter toward my screen. “I would like to see who it is.”

Katie turned her laptop camera toward her doorway—and froze in terror as Chris, the exact guy who had broken her nose open and torn her swimsuit top in the therapeutic pool the afternoon before, stood in her doorway waving a reassigned plastic keycard and launching into an aggressive verbal altercation with her.

I didn’t hesitate for half a second.

“Katie: pack your things and come to my room,” I said into the microphone. Turning my wheelchair toward Tina and Jim, I said, “I’m going to go get my sister. Jim, please come with me just in case that boy tries something.”

I looked straight back into the webcam lens where Chris stood in Katie’s doorway and said coldly, “You touch my sister again and I will personally murder you.” Then I flashed a single look across the counter at Herb that said plain as day: Don’t even think about arguing with me.

Herb looked back at me with quiet respect. “You really care about your sister, don’t you?”

I nodded once and pushed my joystick full forward down the corridor toward the women’s wing, with Jim and two more classmates from our class, Bryan and Sean, striding right beside my wheelchair.

By the time we turned into Katie's hallway, Chris had bolted out the side exit and Katie was shoving her clothes into her open suitcase with trembling hands. Rolling straight inside, I helped her sweep the rest of her clothes and toiletries into her bags while Jim, Bryan, and Sean lifted her suitcases to carry them back to my room on the men's wing.

Tears were streaming down Katie's cheeks around her nasal bandage as she rolled her wheelchair into my room beside me. Taking one look at her face when he checked the doorway, Herb didn't say a word about Level 2 visitation rules; he could see Katie was one breath away from snapping.

Katie wrapped her arm tightly around my shoulders, and I looked straight at Herb. "I don't care what the rules state." Turning to Tina, who held the reassigned keycard to the second bed in my room, I asked, "Would you care if my sister and I shared my bed tonight?"

"Campus Police to Barton Hall," crackled loudly over Herb's walkie-talkie.

Herb hurried out of the hallway toward the main lobby to answer the radio call, leaving Amanda, Bryan, Jim, Katie, Kim, Sarah, Sean, Tina, and me inside the room. Looking through her glasses at the frightened expression on Katie's face, Tina spoke with warm, unmistakable kindness.

"She needs you right now, Nate," Tina said. "I have no problems at all, as long as you two think you both can fit on that tiny bed."

Once the door closed and we sat together on the edge of my narrow mattress, I took my sister's shaking hands in mine. "Katie, what's wrong?"

Katie looked at me with wide, terrified blue eyes and squeaked, "Thank you for insisting I come down here."

Leaning close against my shoulder so her voice barely rose above a whisper, she trembled. "Nate… right before he opened my door, I heard crying down the hall. I think he hurt Natalie!"

Like a dam breaking, Katie buried her face against my neck and sobbed. Across the room, Tina, Sarah, and Jim exchanged grim, horrified looks: everyone on campus knew that while Natalie was chronologically an adult, cognitively she had the mind of a young child.

Tina sat down on the chair beside us, resting a steadying hand on Katie's arm while the rest of our classmates kept watch by the door.

"Would you like to change into your PJs?" I asked my sister gently.

"Please," she whispered, clutching my wrist and bringing me into the bathroom with her so she wouldn't have to be alone behind a closed door for even sixty seconds.

When we came back out in our pajamas, Tina looked at the two of us with quiet resolve. "You know I drive my compact sedan home to Luray every single Friday afternoon anyway," Tina said. "How about this weekend the two of you come with me and spend it at my house in Luray?"

"That might not be a bad idea," Katie whispered, wiping her eyes with her sleeve.

“Pack yourselves a duffel bag tomorrow, and we will leave on Friday at three-thirty sharp as soon as Mr. Alderman’s class is over,” Tina promised, reaching for the wall switch to turn off the overhead fluorescent light as Katie and I climbed onto my narrow twin mattress together.

“On one hand, I’m glad we are back together again,” Katie whispered in the dark, pressing her forehead against my collarbone, “but yet on the other, I feel so weird and sick about what happened tonight.”

I wrapped both arms securely around her and whispered back, “I can’t wait to get out of here with Tina on Friday.”

Neither of us slept a single wink all night, lying wide awake in each other’s arms on that narrow institutional mattress until the sky outside the window turned gray.

Thursday, March 15, 2007, 6:15 AM — Canceled Write-Up Meetings & Sweeping Wednesday Night Under the Rug

At six-fifteen on Thursday morning, having not slept a minute, Katie, Tina, Sarah, and I dressed quietly and rolled out of my room into the main Barton Hall lobby, where Herb and the weekday morning supervisor, Kellie, were standing behind the counter surrounded by stacks of handwritten room rosters.

“Morning, you four,” Kellie said in his deep voice, gesturing toward the dark computer terminal on his desk without a single word of reprimand about Katie sleeping in my room the night before. “Our housing database is still completely locked up from last night’s scrambled bed reassignments, and the entire counseling wing is in an emergency staff meeting trying to sort out who is sleeping where—so Nathaniel, Katie, your counselor’s ten-o’clock disciplinary meeting over Tuesday night’s closet write-up is canceled.”

“Thank you for letting us know,” I said, keeping my left arm wrapped around my twin sister’s shoulders as the four of us rolled back out of the lobby toward the dining hall breezeway.

Once the automatic glass doors slid shut behind us, Tina glanced over her glasses at Katie and me with a dry, knowing smirk. “Well, how about that. If their own room database hadn’t blown up in their faces last night, your counselor would have been sliding a Level 1 restriction and a mandatory separation contract across her desk at ten o’clock this morning—and the two of you would already be on the phone calling your dad in Alexandria to come get you today.”

“And instead, their own chaos just bought us today and tomorrow in Mr. Alderman’s lab to copy the rest of the PHP and SQL curriculum onto our laptops before we head to Luray with you tomorrow afternoon,” Katie whispered back, squeezing my hand.

Right outside the cafeteria doors, Katie gasped softly and pointed toward the concrete bench by the bushes. Sitting on the bench surrounded by three of her friends was Natalie, sobbing inconsolably and rocking back and forth.

“That thing… he pees from…” Natalie stammered through her tears, rubbing at her eyes like a hurting seven-year-old child who only understood that what had been done to her had caused sharp physical pain, with no adult comprehension of the violation itself or the lifelong weight of its consequences.

“I think… well… I don’t even want to consider it,” Katie whispered in horror beside me, her hand shaking in mine as Jim walked up behind us and saw the look on our faces. Every single one of us knew right then what Chris had done to Natalie before he had walked down the hall with that reassigned keycard to Katie’s door.

“Katie, I’m so glad I insisted on you spending the night with me,” I whispered, holding her hand tightly as the dining hall doors opened at six-thirty.

Carrying our trays to the far corner table away from the noise, Katie, Sarah, Tina, and I sat together in grim silence.

“What happened to Natalie last night—and Chris walking straight up to your door with a dorm keycard twenty-four hours after breaking your nose in the pool—is an absolute disgrace,” Tina said quietly behind her glasses. “And watch: the center administration is going to drag its heels and bury the whole thing so they don’t look bad in Richmond.”

Trying to coax even a faint breath out of my pale sister, I tapped my plastic fork against the rock-hard gray square sitting on my plate that was supposed to be toast and asked rhetorically, “What is this?!”

Less than an hour later, as we rolled along the walkway from the dining hall toward Mr. Alderman’s classroom at seven-fifty, we stopped by the curb and watched in stunned, furious silence as two RRC staffers escorted Chris out to a waiting passenger van by the front gate carrying his duffel bag—with not a single state trooper cruiser, sheriff’s deputy, or pair of handcuffs in sight.

“Wait—they’re just kicking him out and putting him in a van?” Tina said aloud on the sidewalk beside Katie’s wheelchair, her voice shaking with anger. “He assaulted Katie in the pool on Tuesday, he attacked Natalie in the dorms last night during their own keycard mix-up, and instead of calling the State Police and having him arrested in handcuffs, the administration is just escorting him off the property and sweeping the whole thing under the rug so it doesn’t show up on a state incident report?!”

“Look at the courtyard,” I said bitterly as the eight-o’clock bell rang and classes resumed across campus as if nothing had happened at all, while Natalie’s friends led her weeping toward the clinic. “They wouldn’t even let Katie and me sleep in a hallway closet together without threatening to write us up, and they just let a predator walk out the front gate without calling the police.”

Part 2: Sharing the Daybed at Tina’s House in Luray, Walking Out After Twelve Days, & Coming Home to Kempsville

Date: 2007-03-16 at 15:45 America/New_York

Friday, March 16, 2007, 3:45 PM — Collapsing Our Wheelchairs into Tina's Compact Sedan & The Living-Room Daybed in Luray

"See how easy that is when you don't have two four-hundred-pound power bases to wrestle with?" Tina smiled back at Katie and me through her glasses at three-forty-five on Friday afternoon, standing at the open trunk of her silver four-door compact sedan in the Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center student parking lot.

Sitting side by side on the rear passenger bench seat holding hands through the open back door with our packed duffel bags and laptop cases tucked at our feet—and the white MedStrip and gauze bandage from Tuesday's pool assault still taped across the bridge of Katie's nose for the rest of the week—Katie and I watched as Tina unclipped the compact battery boxes from underneath our two folding wheelchairs, pulled straight up on the canvas seat straps to collapse both cross-brace frames flat, and lifted the folded frames—spoked push-rim wheels, rear rubber push-handles, and right-armrest joysticks and all—smoothly into her trunk side by side.

"Dr. Carter knew what she was doing when she had us leave our full-size SwiftChairs back at the house in Virginia Beach," I said, letting out a long breath as Tina closed the trunk lid, climbed behind the steering wheel, and turned out of the campus gates onto Route 250 toward Route 340 North.

"Take a good look in the rearview mirror, you two," Tina said cheerfully as the flat-roofed 1960s and 1970s red-brick dormitories of Fishersville disappeared behind the tree line and the Blue Ridge Mountains rose to our right along the Shenandoah River. "Every Friday at three-thirty, I put that place in my mirror and don't think about a single clipboard until Monday morning."

An hour and fifteen minutes later, when Tina turned into her driveway in the quiet green valley of Luray and unfolded our wheelchairs by the front porch, rolling inside her sunlit house felt like stepping out of a monochrome prison into another world. In Tina's kitchen, a pot of homemade beef stew was simmering on the stove; in the living room, where afternoon sunlight slanted across a braided rug with not a single laminated institutional rule sign on the walls, Tina had already pulled out her wide living-room daybed and made it up with crisp cotton sheets, four fluffy pillows, and a thick patchwork quilt specifically for the two of us.

At ten-thirty that night, after eating two bowls apiece of real home-cooked stew and talking PHP arrays and SQL joins around Tina's kitchen table, Katie and I changed into our pajamas and climbed onto the wide living-room daybed together.

"Goodnight, you two—sleep as late as you want tomorrow morning, and nobody is knocking on any doors at eleven o'clock in my house," Tina said warmly, clicking off the hallway lamp on her way to her bedroom.

In the quiet dark of Tina's living room, Katie curled straight into my arms under the quilt, buried her face against my collarbone, and let out a long, shuddering sigh that released twelve solid days of tension all at once.

"Nate," Katie whispered, lacing her fingers tightly through mine, "I am never spending another night in Barton Hall. Twelve days of that place is more than enough for an entire lifetime."

I listened to the quiet mountain wind rustling the trees outside Tina's front window, holding my twin sister close.

"We don't have to go back, Katie," I whispered, rubbing her back under the quilt. "Before we shut down our laptops in Mr. Alderman's lab at three-thirty today, we copied the entire PHP 5 and SQL course syllabus and every textbook exercise onto both of our hard drives. We already have our associate degrees from the Community College of Hampton Roads. We don't need to stay locked up in Barton Hall as Level 2 clients begging for yellow Hall Passes—or stay at a center that sweeps what happened to Natalie under the rug just to protect whatever state funding they get for keeping their dorm beds and classroom seats filled—when we can master server-side PHP and SQL from home."

Sunday, March 18, 2007, 1:00 PM — Calling Dad to Pack Up Barton Hall & Returning to Our Routine in Virginia Beach

"I don't blame you two one bit," Tina said over hot pancakes and fresh apple juice at her dining table on Saturday morning, setting her coffee mug down and adjusting her glasses beneath her jet-black hair after Katie and I told her our decision and dialed Dad's number in Alexandria on speakerphone. "Between the aides grabbing your wheelchair push-handles during Voc Eval, that insulting ValueMart door-greeter pitch, keeping you stuck in Barton Hall on Level 2 with yellow Hall Passes, the Chickenshit Report after the pool, writing you up for sleeping in a closet, and the disgusting way the administration swept what Chris did to Natalie under the rug on Thursday, I wouldn't stay another night in those dorms either if I were in your shoes. You already copied Mr. Alderman's full PHP and SQL curriculum onto your laptops, and Sheila, Jim, and I are online every afternoon. We'll share every lecture note, review each other's database code over instant messenger, and build our projects together without a single dorm supervisor breathing down your necks."

"Listen to me, both of you," Dad's voice came through the speakerphone from his house on Sunset Drive in Alexandria, warm and fierce at the same time. "I couldn't be prouder of you for standing up for each other and walking away from a place that refused to respect your dignity or your bond. Stay right there at Tina's house today and rest up. Tomorrow morning I'm driving my pickup truck down Interstate 81, we'll stop by Fishersville just long enough to clear the rest of your clothes out of Barton Hall and drop your room keys on the front desk, and I'll bring you straight home to Virginia Beach."

At one o'clock on Sunday afternoon, March 18, 2007—exactly fourteen days after we had first rolled through the doors of Barton Hall—Dad backed his pickup truck up to the curb outside Barton Hall while Tina parked her compact sedan right beside him. The second Dad stepped out of his truck and saw the white MedStrip and gauze bandage still taped across the bridge of his daughter's nose from Tuesday's pool assault, his jaw set into solid granite as he wrapped both of us in a fierce hug. Within twenty minutes, Dad, Jim, and Tina had loaded the rest of our suitcases from our dorm rooms into the bed of the pickup truck, and Katie and I rolled side by side up to the Barton Hall front counter.

Without waiting for a single exit interview or the canceled Thursday counselor write-up meeting over the hallway closet, Katie and I dropped our Level 2 room keys onto the wooden blotter simultaneously.

“We’re checking out permanently,” Katie told the startled Sunday desk clerk, before both of us spun our wheelchairs around, rolled out the automatic glass doors into the sunshine, and hugged Tina, Sheila, and Jim tightly in the parking lot.

“Log onto instant messenger as soon as you get unpacked down at the coast,” Tina told us, squeezing Katie’s hand and then mine before we transferred into the cab of Dad’s pickup truck. “Module Four on database normalization starts Monday morning at nine sharp, and Sheila, Jim, and I expect your code in the shared folder!”

“Count on it!” Katie grinned out the passenger window as Dad pulled out of the lot and headed east toward Afton Mountain and Interstate 64.

“Are you sure it’s no trouble for us to move back into the Arvin Road house while you’re working up in Tysons Corner during the week, Dad?” I asked as the pickup climbed toward the Blue Ridge tunnel.

“Trouble? Nate, that’s the entire reason I kept the Virginia Beach house when I bought the place on Sunset Drive in Alexandria and updated my driver’s license,” Dad said, reaching across the console to pat my knee and Katie’s shoulder. “I bought that brick ranch on Arvin Road off Indian River Road and Military Highway from our old landlord years ago so the two of you would always have your own ramp, your own walk-in closet sanctuary, and the Kempsville streets and bus routes you know by heart. That house is yours for as long as you want it.”

When Dad pulled into the driveway on Arvin Road in Virginia Beach at dusk that Sunday evening and unlocked the front door at the top of the aluminum wheelchair ramp, Katie and I transferred out of the travel frames right back into our full-size SwiftChair power wheelchairs, rolled side by side to our familiar dining table, and opened our laptop lids together just as Tina, Sheila, and Jim’s names lit up green on our screens.

Unofficial Homeowners: Back Home in Virginia Beach (2007–2008)

Arvin Road, Crossing Without a Crosswalk, Horizontal IDs on Route 12, & Yearly Passes at Fairlawn

Part 1: Unofficial Homeowners, One Bedroom and One Office, & The Closet We Both Know We’ll Use

Date: 2007-03-18 at 18:30 America/New_York

Sunday, March 18, 2007, 6:30 PM — Unofficial Homeowners & The Address on Our State ID Cards

“Oh, thank goodness,” Katie breathed at six-thirty on Sunday evening the second she slid off the folding manual travel chair onto the padded contoured seat of her full-size black SwiftChair inside our front foyer, resting her right hand on the familiar fingertip joystick. “No rear push-handles for strangers to grab, no clunky clamp-on battery box underneath, and no yellow Level 2 Hall Pass required to roll down our own hallway.”

“Amen to that,” I said, transferring into my own full-size SwiftChair right beside hers and powering on my controller as Dad lifted our two collapsed manual travel frames—spoked push-rim wheels and all—and tucked them neatly into the back of the front hall utility closet in case Tina or another friend ever picked us up in a compact car.

Rolling side by side out of the foyer into the warm kitchen of our single-story brick ranch on Arvin Road at the corner of Indian River Road, Katie and I stopped by the dining table and simply took in the quiet. Outside the kitchen window, the familiar neighborhood streetlamps of Kempsville were flickering on in the March dusk.

Dad walked in from the garage carrying the last of our suitcases from the bed of his pickup truck, set two newly cut brass house keys and a blue leather household binder on the table between our wheelchairs, and pulled up a wooden dining chair across from us.

“Alright, you two,” Dad said warmly, opening the front flap of the binder to show us the printed account sheet and sliding two reloadable Meridian debit cards across the laminate tabletop toward our hands. “Before we start moving furniture and before I have to head back up to Alexandria tonight for work in Tysons Corner tomorrow morning, let’s go over how everything works here so neither of you has to worry about a single bill. The mortgage on this house, the City of Virginia Beach real-estate taxes, the homeowner’s insurance, the electric bill, the water and sewer, and the high-speed cable internet are all set to automatic payment straight out of my main checking account up in Northern Virginia. You don’t ever have to touch a utility bill.”

He tapped the two debit cards sitting in front of Katie and me.

“Every Friday morning when my paycheck clears, your grocery and spending money goes straight into this joint checking account,” Dad continued. “Until your own software and web-development work starts paying what you want it to pay, every dime of your groceries, bus passes, computer parts, and spending money is covered. As far as day-to-day life goes, the two of you are the unofficial homeowners of our house here on Arvin Road.”

Katie reached into her crossbody bag, unzipped her wallet, and pulled out her laminated Virginia Department of Motor Vehicles identification card, setting it down on the table beside her debit card.

“Look at the address line, Nate,” Katie smiled, tapping the plastic card with her fingernail.

I pulled my own wallet out of my jeans pocket and laid my Virginia State ID card right beside hers. Printed across the front of both cards in crisp black DMV block letters was the exact Arvin Road address in Virginia Beach where we were sitting right now.

“We never even have to go to the DMV to change our address,” I said, grinning across the table at Dad. “That’s the exact address we’ve had on our State ID cards ever since the three of us left Mom back in September 2001. Neither of us ever bothered updating our IDs when Katie was up in Williamsburg or when I was over in Norfolk, because this house was always home base.”

“And because we turned eighteen right here at this table in April 2003 when we were seniors at Northwood High,” Katie added, her blue eyes lighting up as she connected the dots, “our Virginia Beach voter registrations at the Kempsville precinct have been anchored to this exact address for four straight years too.”

“Which means as far as the Commonwealth of Virginia and the City of Virginia Beach are concerned,” Dad chuckled, patting both of our hands across the table, “you never left. Now—I’ve still got three hours before I need to get on Interstate 64 and head up to Alexandria, and we’ve got three bedrooms down that hallway to set up the way you two want them. Tell the moving crew what the floorplan is.”

7:15 PM — Reconfiguring the Three Bedrooms: Dad’s Room, Our Dual-Desk Office, & The Queen Bed With the Closet Sanctuary

Katie and I exchanged a single glance across our wheelchair armrests—having already mapped out every square foot of the hallway during the drive down from Luray in the cab of Dad’s pickup truck—and rolled side by side down the hardwood corridor with Dad walking right behind us.

“First,” I said, pausing outside the open door of the master bedroom at the end of the hall, “the master bedroom stays a hundred percent yours, Dad. Whenever you drive down from Alexandria on the weekends or for holidays, or whenever you have work down in Hampton Roads and need a place to sleep, your room and your bed are right here waiting for you.”

“Deal,” Dad smiled. “What about the two bedrooms you two have had since 2001?”

Katie released her joystick brake and rolled three feet left to the doorway of the middle bedroom—the room that had been mine during high school—before turning to point across the hall to the room that had been hers since 2001, where the framed watercolor print of a blue butterfly still hung on the cream drywall.

“After twelve days of Barton Hall forcing us onto separate wings every night at eleven o’clock,” Katie said firmly, her fingers lacing through mine between our chairs, “Nate and I made our decision together. We are living together in this house as brother and sister, and we don’t want two separate sleeping bedrooms anymore. We’re going to sleep in the room that was my bedroom, and put the queen-size bed in there.”

“And the bedroom that was my room,” I picked up seamlessly, gesturing into my old room across the hall, “becomes our office. If we take my old twin bed frame out to the garage storage bay, we have a whole twelve-by-twelve room along the front window where we can put two wide computer desks side by side, wire our ethernet switch and our local Linux testing server right into the cable modem, and roll both of our SwiftChairs up next to each other all day while we work through Mr. Alderman's PHP and SQL modules with Tina, Sheila, and Jim."

"And one more thing inside our bedroom," Katie added softly, looking up at Dad with earnest blue eyes as she pointed toward the wide double doors of her bedroom closet. "Inside the closet, we want to clear the floor completely clean and put our thick sleeping bag and four pillows down on the carpet—so whenever we want that quiet, confined space together to feel completely secure, it's already set up waiting for us."

Dad looked at the two of us holding hands between our wheelchairs, and his expression softened with unmistakable fatherly pride and understanding. He didn't ask a single skeptical question, didn't lecture us about "normal" adult bedrooms, and didn't bat an eye.

"Then let's get to work," Dad said, rolling up the sleeves of his flannel shirt.

For the next hour and a half, the three of us transformed the hallway. First, Dad unbolted the steel rails of my old twin bed, stacked the frame neatly against the dry wall of the garage, and helped us slide two sturdy six-foot laminate worktables flush against each other along the wall of my old bedroom. While Katie organized our spiral notebooks and reference manuals on the lower bookshelf that we could reach easily from our wheelchair seats, I plugged our surge protectors, gigabit switch, and laptop docking cables underneath the desks—testing the clearance so both of our SwiftChairs could roll straight under the tabletop side by side with less than an inch between our armrests.

Across the hall in Katie's room, Dad carried in the queen box spring and mattress, centered the headboard directly beneath the framed blue butterfly print, and helped us pull on the fitted cotton sheets and the soft navy-and-slate-blue queen comforter set we had bought together at Chesapeake Bay Mall back in November 2005.

Then Dad stepped over to the wide bedroom closet, moved the low shoe rack and spare boxes into the hall storage cupboard, vacuumed the closet carpet from corner to corner, and helped us spread our thick double sleeping bag and quilted pad across the floor of the closet, banking four plush pillows in a neat row against the interior wall.

Stepping back with his hands on his hips, Dad looked from the freshly made navy-and-slate-blue queen bed in the center of the bedroom over to the open closet doors, where the sleeping bag and four pillows sat tucked inside the quiet three-by-six-foot alcove.

A slow, knowing grin spread across Dad's face, and Katie and I started laughing right along with him.

"Now, that queen bed looks mighty sharp sitting there in the middle of the room," Dad chuckled, shaking his head affectionately as he looked down at the two of us, "even if all three of us in this room know perfectly well that you two are probably going to sleep in that closet every single night."

“Hey, the queen bed is great for reading code books in the afternoon and folding laundry,” Katie giggled, her cheeks warming as she squeezed my hand, “and the closet doesn’t have any windows or hallway noise.”

“And nobody in this house is ever going to yank the closet door open at eleven o’clock with a flashlight,” I said quietly, looking at the soft pillows tucked inside the alcove.

“Not in your house, Nate,” Dad said firmly, resting a hand on my shoulder and then on Katie’s. “In this house, you sleep wherever the two of you feel safest.”

9:45 PM — Dad Heads Back to Alexandria, Locking Our Front Door, & Our First Night Back in the Closet

After a quick eight-thirty run across Indian River Road in Dad’s pickup truck to the Market Square supermarket to load the kitchen refrigerator and pantry with two gallons of cold milk, cartons of chocolate milk, two twelve-packs of ginger ale, cereal boxes, bread, sandwich turkey, and frozen dinners, Katie and I rolled out onto the front porch at the top of our aluminum wheelchair ramp at quarter to ten to see Dad off.

“I’ll call you both tomorrow evening on my way home from Tysons Corner—and I’ve already cleared Tuesday afternoon on my calendar so I can drive back down and be right there in the exam room with you at Dr. Carter’s office when she checks Katie’s nose and takes that bandage off,” Dad said, bending down in the cool March night air to wrap Katie and me in a tight three-way hug at the top of the ramp. “Have fun jumping into Module Four with Tina, Sheila, and Jim in the morning—and enjoy having your house back.”

“Drive safe up I-95, Dad, and call us when you get to Alexandria,” Katie told him, hugging his neck before waving from her wheelchair as he climbed into the cab of his pickup truck.

We sat side by side at the top of the aluminum ramp, holding hands as Dad backed down the driveway, tapped his horn twice in a soft goodbye, and turned off Arvin Road onto Indian River Road toward Military Highway and Interstate 64.

Once the red taillights disappeared behind the pine trees at the corner, we wheeled back across the threshold into the warm foyer, pushed the solid wooden front door shut, and turned the brass deadbolt until it clicked firmly into place.

For the first time in our adult lives, the entire house was ours.

Rolling side by side down the quiet hallway past our newly wired dual-desk office, we brushed our teeth together at the bathroom sink, turned into our bedroom, and clicked off the overhead ceiling fixture until only the warm amber glow of the small nightstand lamp illuminated the room.

Right in front of us sat the pristine navy-and-slate-blue queen bed. Three feet to our right stood the open doors of the bedroom closet, where our thick sleeping bag and four plush pillows waited in the quiet, enclosed shadows.

Even with our own front door deadbolted behind us, both of our nervous systems were still raw—still shaken, scared, upset, and angry over those twelve days at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center, from the pool and Wednesday night's keycard terror to the staffer yanking the Barton Hall closet door open at eleven o'clock and writing us up for holding each other.

Katie looked at the queen bed, looked over at the open closet doorway, and reached for the hem of her shirt.

"Closet?" I whispered.

"Closet," Katie whispered back without half a second's hesitation. "And no pajamas tonight, Nate. Just us."

We rolled our two SwiftChairs right up to the edge of the open closet doorway, parked them side by side with our armrests touching, switched off both joystick controllers, and helped each other slip out of our clothes, folding them neatly across our wheelchair seats. Lowering ourselves smoothly inside our single shared sleeping bag on the carpeted closet floor, I reached out and pulled the closet door almost all the way shut until just a thin ribbon of warm light filtered across the carpet, zipped the sleeping bag up around our shoulders, and wrapped both of my arms tightly around my twin sister, skin to skin.

Pressing her warm cheek against my bare chest and tangling her legs with mine inside the dark, enclosed space—doing the exact thing that would have gotten us written up and thrown out of Barton Hall—Katie let out a long, trembling breath that finally melted the last knot of Fishersville tension from her shoulders. Holding each other close while the queen bed out in the bedroom sat completely untouched, we drifted straight off to sleep in our own closet, in our own home, where nobody in the world could ever separate us again.

Part 2: Dr. Carter's Exam Room, Skin to Skin in the Closet, & No Crosswalks at Military and Indian River

Date: 2007-03-20 at 14:00 America/New_York

Tuesday, March 20, 2007, 2:00 PM — Dr. Evelyn Carter's Exam Room, Peeling Off the Seven-Day Bandage, & Our Annual Physicals With Dad

"You're safe right here with me and Dad, Katie," I whispered at two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon inside Exam Room Two at Dr. Evelyn Carter's family medicine office on Kempsville Road, keeping both of my arms wrapped tightly around my twin sister's shoulders across the gap between our parked SwiftChairs.

With our inner armrests flipped up and out of the way so our wheelchairs could sit flush against each other, Katie buried her cheek against my collarbone and hugged me back with both arms just as tightly. Right behind our chairs, having driven his pickup truck down from Northern Virginia that morning so he wouldn't miss a minute of the appointment, Dad stood with one steady hand resting on my shoulder and the other on Katie's back.

Even in Dr. Carter's familiar ground-floor office—where she had been taking care of the two of us ever since Dad moved us into the brick ranch on Arvin Road back in the autumn of 2001—just sitting under fluorescent clinical lights next to a paper-lined examination table only seven days after the Bates-Harding clinic nurses had taped Katie's split nasal bridge had both of our nervous systems on high alert. Holding onto each other in a full two-arm embrace was the only way to keep the memory of Fishersville out of the room.

A gentle two-beat knock sounded at the wooden door before Dr. Evelyn Carter stepped inside carrying both of our thick manila medical charts and a stainless-steel tray with sterile saline packets and gauze pads. Seeing Katie and me locked in a tight two-arm hug between our wheelchairs with the white gauze-and-paper-tape dressing across the bridge of Katie's nose, Dr. Carter didn't rush us or ask us to pull apart. Instead, she pushed the exam room door firmly shut, set her charts on the counter, and rolled her cushioned stool over in front of us with quiet, unmistakable concern.

"Take all the time you two need," Dr. Carter said softly, looking from Katie and me up to Dad. "David told me on the phone yesterday that he brought you both home from Fishersville for good on Sunday, and that a male client struck Katie in the face in the therapeutic pool last Tuesday. Tell me what happened up there."

Still holding onto each other, Katie and I told Dr. Carter everything while Dad stood right behind us—starting on our very first afternoon when an aide grabbed Katie's manual wheelchair push-handles without asking and tried to steer her down the women's wing like a shopping cart, and going right through the Vocational Evaluator who looked at our accredited computer-science associate degrees from the Community College of Hampton Roads and pitched us a partnership to work as door greeters at the Waynesboro ValueMart. We told her how they kept us stuck on Level 2 in Barton Hall begging for signed yellow paper Hall Passes because moving to Cantor Hall required earning Level 3; how Chris struck Katie in the face and ripped her swimsuit top in the ninety-two-degree pool while a poolside staffer wrote me up on the morning Chickenshit Report for covering my sister's bare chest while she held her bleeding nose with both hands; how a night supervisor unlocked a hallway seasonal storage closet with a master key after the eleven o'clock bed check and accused us of having sex when we were in full street clothes holding each other on bags of curtains; and how the administration scrambled on Thursday to sweep Chris's Wednesday night keycard assault on Natalie under the rug without calling the police just to keep their dorm beds and classroom seats filled.

"We never want to set foot inside Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center ever again, Dr. Carter," Katie said fiercely, lifting her chin from my shoulder as her blue eyes met the doctor's.

"Not for a single day," I added right beside her, my arm still around her waist. "We already have our associate degrees, and we copied the entire PHP and SQL web-development curriculum onto our laptops before we left on Friday. We just want to go home to our house on Arvin Road and live together where no one can ever tell us that we aren't allowed to share a bed or even a closet!"

Dr. Carter's jaw tightened with visible indignation as she uncapped her fountain pen, opened both of our medical charts on her lap, and wrote several firm lines in black ink across the top of each clinical summary sheet.

"Then neither of you will ever set foot in that place again," Dr. Carter said firmly, looking straight at Dad and then back at the two of us. "I am documenting right here in both of your permanent medical files that any institutional program that forcibly separates the two of you, threatens you with isolation contracts for seeking sensory grounding together, or allows staff to grab your wheelchairs without consent is medically contraindicated and actively harmful to your cerebral palsy spasticity and autistic regulation. Your home on Arvin Road is exactly where you belong."

"Thank you, Evelyn," Dad said quietly, his hand squeezing Katie's shoulder.

"Now, Katie," Dr. Carter smiled warmly, snapping on a pair of blue nitrile gloves and opening a warm sterile saline swab, "let's take a look at the bridge of that nose and get those seven-day wound-closure strips off your face so you don't have to look at them in the mirror anymore."

Taking a slow breath together, Katie and I eased out of our tight two-arm hug so Katie could sit upright facing the doctor—and immediately relaxed to holding hands, lacing my right fingers through her left fingers across the gap between our wheelchairs while Dad kept his hand on her shoulder.

Never letting go of my hand, Katie held completely still as Dr. Carter moistened the paper tape with warm saline, lifted the outer white gauze square away, and then carefully peeled off the three narrow, sterile MedStrip wound-closure strips that the Bates-Harding clinic nurses had taped across the split skin on the bony bridge of her nose the previous Tuesday.

Switching on her penlight, Dr. Carter examined the bridge of Katie's nose closely, gently palpated the nasal bone and cartilage, and checked inside both nostrils.

"That knitted together beautifully, Katie," Dr. Carter said, clicking off her penlight and handing Katie a small hand mirror from the counter. "Keeping those MedStrips dry for the full seven days did the trick. The split skin across the bridge has closed into a clean, flat seam that will fade completely over the next couple of weeks, your septum is straight, and the hairline contusion on the nasal bone is stable and healing right on schedule."

Katie tilted the small mirror toward her eyes, touched the smooth bridge of her nose lightly with her free right fingertips, and beamed at me across our joined hands. "Look, Nate—no more bandage! And right in time for us to go to the Buckner Boulevard DMV on Friday to get our horizontal twenty-one-and-over State ID pictures taken!"

"And speaking of turning twenty-two on April eighth," Dr. Carter said, glancing down at the preventive-care tabs on our two open charts with a warm smile, "you two are less than three weeks away from your annual physical date anyway. Since you're both already sitting right here in my exam room and David is here with you before he drives back up to Alexandria tonight, how would you feel about knocking out both of your annual physicals right now so you don't have to make a second trip next month?"

Katie and I looked at each other across our wheelchairs. As long as nobody asked us to let go of each other's hand, getting our annual checkups done in one sitting meant uninterrupted weeks at home in our new office on Arvin Road.

"Let's do it right now," Katie said, and I nodded right along with her.

For the next twenty-five minutes, with Dad sitting right beside us and our fingers stayed laced together across our wheelchair armrests, Dr. Carter completed both of our annual physicals side by side—checking our blood pressure cuffs on our outer arms, listening to our hearts and lungs with her warmed stethoscope, checking our ears and reflexes, and evaluating our lower-extremity cerebral palsy muscle tone and seated posture in our full-size SwiftChairs. By two-forty-five, she had signed off on a clean bill of health for both of us, and after Dad took us out for an early dinner and gave us one more fierce hug at the top of our aluminum porch ramp on Arvin Road before heading back up Interstate 64 to Alexandria for the rest of the workweek, our house was completely ours again.

Wednesday, March 21, 2007, 8:30 AM — Waking Up in Our Closet Sanctuary & Morning PHP With Tina, Sheila, and Jim “You’re warm,” Katie murmured sleepily at eight-thirty on Wednesday morning, her bare shoulder pressed tightly against my chest inside our single shared sleeping bag on the carpeted floor of our bedroom closet.

I kissed the top of her blonde hair in the quiet dark and kept my arms wrapped securely around her waist. Outside in the main bedroom, three feet past the nearly closed closet door, the navy-and-slate-blue comforter on our queen-size bed hadn’t been unfolded once since Dad helped us make it on Sunday night.

Neither of us had the slightest interest in sleeping out on that open mattress. Even after telling Dr. Carter everything yesterday afternoon, our minds were still raw—still carrying the lingering fear of Chris standing in Katie’s doorway with a reassigned dorm keycard after hurting Natalie, the fury of watching the administration escort him into a van without calling the police, and the humiliation of a night-shift staffer yanking the Barton Hall hallway closet door open at eleven o’clock to write us up for holding each other. Waking up undressed together inside our own dark, enclosed closet on Arvin Road—feeling each other’s steady breathing skin to skin and knowing we were doing the exact thing that would have gotten us punished and separated at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center—was the only medicine that kept the nightmares away.

“Nobody knocking on the door,” I whispered against her temple. “Nobody checking Hall Passes.”

“Just us,” Katie whispered back, hugging my ribs tightly for another full minute—her face finally free of the seven-day nasal bandage Dr. Carter had peeled off the afternoon before—until we unzipped the sleeping bag, reached up to pull our folded shirts and jeans off the seats of our parked SwiftChairs just outside the closet doorway, and transferred up into our chairs.

After helping each other shower on the padded transfer bench in the hall bathroom and pouring two bowls of cereal with cold milk in the kitchen, we rolled across the hardwood hallway into my old bedroom—now officially our dual-desk software office.

At nine o’clock sharp, right as we slid our two SwiftChairs side by side underneath the twelve-foot span of laminate worktables with our armrests touching, our instant-messenger client chimed. On our screens, Tina, Sheila, and Jim popped online from the Web Applications Developer classroom back in Fishersville.

“Look at the two of you sitting in a real office without a single yellow Level 2 badge in sight!” Tina typed into the group chat window, waving quietly at her webcam before her instructor walked past the front whiteboard. “Mr. Alderman just handed out the Module Four exercise sheet on relational foreign keys and PHP session arrays. Check your shared folder—I just uploaded the prompt!”

For the next few days, while morning sunlight slanted through the front blinds onto our keyboards, Katie and I worked on a couple of the copied PHP and SQL exercises unofficially from home while chatting with Tina, Sheila, and Jim. We didn’t care one bit that rolling out of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center after twelve days meant we were technically RRC dropouts who had never officially completed the program; both of us already held an Advanced Studies Diploma from Virginia Beach City Public Schools at Northwood High School and an accredited Associate of Applied Science degree from the Community College of Hampton Roads, and we had realized during our first week in Fishersville that an RRC piece of paper meant nothing in the real world compared to our associate degrees and actual working code.

Even better, it didn’t take long working on those copied RRC modules unofficially from home before Katie and I looked at each other across our desks and decided to stop following RRC’s rigid classroom exercises altogether and start doing our own thing—staying friends with Tina, Sheila, and Jim on instant messenger while we focused one hundred percent on rebuilding our transit blog, Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit, from the ground up into a custom database-driven PHP web application where every route timetable, transfer window, and municipal service comparison across all six Hampton Roads cities could be queried dynamically.

2:15 PM — Crossing Without a Crosswalk to Market Square

When we rolled into the kitchen at two-fifteen that afternoon to make turkey sandwiches for lunch, I opened the refrigerator door and held up the plastic milk jug. Less than half an inch of milk sloshed across the bottom, and the bread bag on the counter was down to the two heel slices.

“First solo grocery run without Dad’s pickup truck,” Katie said, glancing out the kitchen window toward the corner of Arvin Road and Indian River Road. “Good thing there’s a Market Square supermarket right across the street.”

“Let’s see how much our two chairs can haul in one trip,” I grinned, rolling back to the hall closet to grab two heavy-duty canvas backpack panniers and two insulated reusable grocery totes.

We slipped the padded straps of the backpack panniers securely over the contoured high backs of both of our SwiftChairs, tucked the folded insulated totes beside our thighs, checked that our battery gauges showed all green bars, and rolled out the front door and down our aluminum porch ramp into the crisp March afternoon.

Exiting the house, we made a right onto quiet Arvin Road and another right onto the sidewalk along Indian River Road, rolling west toward the major signalized intersection where Indian River Road met eight-lane Military Highway.

Across the street sat the brick storefront of the Market Square grocery plaza.

Getting across the asphalt to reach it, however, made both of us stop our wheelchairs dead at the concrete curb cut and stare.

“Wait a second, Nate,” Katie said, raising her voice over the deafening roar of eighteen-wheelers, dump trucks, and commuter sedans barreling through the intersection. “Look at the pavement between our curb cut and the curb cut on the other side of the street.”

I looked down at the wide, oil-stained expanse of multi-lane asphalt.

The intersection had overhead traffic lights. It had sloped concrete curb cuts poured into the corners. Right behind us stood bus stops for CVTA Routes 12 and 15 where transit riders got off the bus every half hour to walk home or buy groceries.

Yet across the entire intersection of Military Highway and Indian River Road, there was not a single painted white crosswalk stripe—and no pedestrian countdown head—anywhere on the pavement.

“How do you pour wheelchair curb cuts at a major intersection with two bus routes and a supermarket across the street,” I asked in disbelief as a pickup truck whipped a fast right turn on red two feet in front of our footplates without even glancing at the sidewalk, “and not paint a single crosswalk line to tell drivers that people cross here?!”

“Stay right beside my left wheel, and don’t move an inch until the through-lane turns red and I check every right-turning bumper,” Katie said, her hand steady on her joystick.

We waited through an entire two-minute signal cycle until the cross-traffic halted, made direct eye contact with the driver at the front of the turning lane so he wouldn’t gun his engine into us, and pushed our joysticks full forward side by side across the bare, unmarked lanes of asphalt. The second our front casters climbed the opposite concrete curb cut into the Market Square parking lot, both of us let out a breath at the exact same time.

Inside the bright, fluorescent aisles of Market Square, our two-wheelchair shopping system worked like clockwork. Instead of struggling with a clumsy metal shopping cart that couldn’t be steered alongside a joystick controller, Katie held the open insulated tote bags on her lap while I pulled a gallon of milk, two cartons of chocolate milk, loaves of whole-wheat bread, sliced turkey, cheddar cheese, apples, and boxes of pasta off the low and middle shelves.

At the checkout register, after swiping the joint checking debit card Dad had given us on Sunday night, we balanced the load evenly between our two chairs like a pair of cargo engineers: the gallon of milk and canned goods went into the heavy canvas backpack slung over the back of my SwiftChair, the chocolate milk, soda six-pack, and frozen boxes went into Katie’s rear pack, and the lighter bags of bread and fruit rode flat across our laps inside the insulated totes.

After waiting through two more heavy traffic cycles to cross the unmarked, crosswalk-free lanes of Indian River Road back to the Arvin Road corner and unpacking our haul into the kitchen fridge, Katie didn’t even take her jacket off before rolling straight into our office bedroom and tapping my monitor.

“Pull up the new PHP admin panel for Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit, Nate,” Katie said, her blue eyes bright with purpose. “We just took our first solo grocery trip from Arvin Road, and our readers—and the traffic engineers at Virginia Beach City Hall—are going to read all about what happens when you put CVTA Route 12 and Route 15 bus stops and a grocery store at Military Highway and Indian River Road with curb cuts, heavy traffic, and zero crosswalks.”

Part 3: Crossing Both Roads for Route 12, Buckner Boulevard DMV, & Horizontal State IDs on the Spot

Date: 2007-03-23 at 09:40 America/New_York

Friday, March 23, 2007, 9:40 AM — Crossing Both Roads to Catch the Southbound Route 12

“Look at how baby-faced we were in these pictures,” Katie laughed on Friday morning as we sat side by side in the hallway by the front door, holding up our two vertical Virginia State identification cards before slipping them into our lanyard pouches.

Both of us had gotten those original vertical Under-21 State ID cards back in October 2001, right after we turned sixteen and moved with Dad into this house on Arvin Road when he was first renting it from the landlord—years before he eventually bought the place outright. Across the top of each vertical card ran the bright red banner announcing the date we would turn twenty-one, and printed underneath our names was our exact street address here on Arvin Road.

Crucially, neither of us had ever bothered telling the Virginia Department of Motor Vehicles about a single one of our temporary moves over the past three and a half years—not when Katie went up to Williamsburg for her freshman year of college and then down to Fishersville, and not when I moved into our Norfolk apartments on Greenway Court and West Ocean View Avenue before heading to Fishersville with her. As far as the DMV’s computer database in Richmond was concerned, Katie and I had lived continuously at this exact house on Arvin Road since we were sixteen years old.

Now that we were twenty-one—and only sixteen days away from turning twenty-two—we wanted to trade in those worn vertical Under-21 cards for proper adult horizontal State ID cards before heading over to Fairlawn Recreation Center on Monday to sign up for resident memberships. And since the nearest DMV Customer Service Center was over on Buckner Boulevard in Virginia Beach, getting there meant taking CVTA Route 12.

At nine-forty that morning, we rolled out our front door and down the aluminum porch ramp into the sunny March air.

Getting from our driveway to the Route 12 stop heading toward the Community College of Hampton Roads required a specific two-stage crossing. Exiting the house, we made a right onto Arvin Road and another right onto the north sidewalk of Indian River Road, rolling west down the block to the roaring multi-lane intersection of Indian River Road and Military Highway.

Because the bus stop for southbound routes sat on the far southwest corner of the intersection, crossing one street wasn't enough—we had to cross both Indian River Road and Military Highway without a single painted crosswalk stripe on either roadway.

"Indian River first while the through-lanes on Military have the green," Katie called out over the rumble of a passing dump truck as we lined our SwiftChairs up side by side at the concrete curb cut.

The moment the turning traffic cleared, we pushed our joysticks forward in tandem across the unmarked asphalt of Indian River Road to the median island and the opposite corner, pivoted ninety degrees at the curb cut, waited through the next signal cycle while eight lanes of Military Highway traffic thundered past our footplates, and then rolled straight across Military Highway to the southbound CVTA bus stop sign.

That southbound stop on Military Highway was a workhorse corner for our end of Kempsville: it served CVTA Route 12 heading east toward the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, as well as CVTA Route 15 heading south toward either Emerald Creek Mall or Robert Hall Boulevard in Chesapeake on an alternating basis.

Seven minutes later, a low-floor CVTA Route 12 coach with 12 CCHR glowing across its amber front destination sign pulled up to the curb, kneeled its front suspension, and unfolded its metal ramp onto the sidewalk so Katie and I could roll aboard and lock down our chairs for the ride over to Buckner Boulevard.

10:35 AM — Two Tickets (`B042` and `B043`), The DMV Waiting Rite of Passage, & Horizontal Cards Printed on the Spot

Rolling through the double glass doors of the Buckner Boulevard DMV Customer Service Center at ten-thirty-five, Katie and I wheeled side by side up to the check-in podium near the entrance.

"Good morning," Katie told the information clerk. "My twin brother and I live together at the same address, and we both need to trade our vertical Under-21 State ID cards for horizontal cards now that we're over twenty-one. Can we just use one ticket number together?"

"Sorry, honey—DMV policy is one ticket number per person, one transaction per ticket," the check-in clerk replied without missing a beat, tapping the touchscreen on the electronic queue ticket dispenser twice and handing Katie a paper slip printed with B042 and me a second slip printed with B043—the B prefix routing us into the queue for driver's license and identification card renewals and reissues.

"Two separate ticket numbers for twins living in the same house," I grumbled under my breath as we rolled over to the open space beside the waiting room chairs.

"At least they're right next to each other," Katie whispered back, glancing up at the red LED matrix board where B039 was flashing. "How long could three numbers possibly take?"

Famous last words.

Over the next ten minutes, the robotic female voice on the overhead ceiling speakers chimed through B040 and then called out:

"Ding-dong… Now serving… Customer Number… B-zero-four-one… at Window… four."

Katie and I both sat up straight in our SwiftChairs and rested our right hands on our joysticks, ready to roll the second B042 was called.

Instead, the DMV's automated queue computer decided that B041 was the end of the B batch—and immediately launched into a twenty-five-minute marathon of every other letter in the alphabet.

"Ding-dong… Now serving… Customer Number… T-one-one-eight… at Window… nine," the robotic voice droned, routing vehicle title and registration paperwork down the hall.

"Ding-dong… Now serving… Customer Number… C-zero-two-seven… at Window… two," it chimed two minutes later for the compliance and suspension desk, followed by a string of A tickets for original learner's permits, D tickets for combined multi-step transactions, and E tickets for the express window.

Every time the two-tone chime echoed across the acoustic ceiling tiles, Katie and I looked up expectantly at the red LED board—only to groan in unison as another T or C flashed on the display while B042 and B043 sat frozen in limbo.

Finally—just when I was starting to wonder if the computer had forgotten the letter B existed—the speaker chimed again:

"Ding-dong… Now serving… Customer Number… B-zero-four-two… at Window… six."

"Finally!" Katie exhaled, and both of us pushed our joysticks forward to roll side by side up to the lowered accessible counter at Window 6.

"Good morning to you both," the DMV representative behind Window 6 smiled as we pulled up.

"Good morning, ma'am," Katie said, sliding her B042 ticket and her 2001 vertical card across the laminate counter while I tried to slide B043 and my vertical card right beside hers. "My brother and I both need new horizontal State ID cards now that we're over the age of twenty-one."

The representative glanced down at my B043 slip and shook her head with an apologetic smile. "I can't open B043 in the computer until I close out B042, young man—you'll have to wait your turn until B043 is called."

I let out a quiet sigh and backed my SwiftChair half a foot to the right to wait my turn while the representative processed Katie's renewal first.

Typing Katie's identification number into her terminal, the representative glanced at her screen. "Are you still at the same address on Arvin Road here in Virginia Beach that we've had on file since October 2001?"

“Yes, ma’am—still the exact same house on Arvin Road,” Katie smiled, confirming that her Virginia Beach voter registration in the Kempsville precinct was still current as well before rolling two feet over to the adjustable camera post in front of the pull-down sky-blue backdrop to have her new photo snapped.

The second Katie’s photo registered in the system and the representative closed out B042 to send Katie’s card to the thermal printer behind the counter, the representative pressed the queue button on her keyboard.

Right above our heads, the ceiling speaker chimed:

“Ding-dong… Now serving… Customer Number… B-zero-four-three… at Window… six.”

“Now it’s officially your turn,” the representative chuckled as I rolled my SwiftChair six inches forward to the exact spot Katie had just vacated and slid B043 and my 2001 vertical card across the counter.

After confirming that I also still lived at the exact same Arvin Road address on file since October 2001, verifying my voter registration, paying our two card fees with our joint debit card, and having my own picture snapped in front of the blue screen, I rolled right back beside Katie’s chair at Window 6 while the thermal card printer behind the counter whirred through its second pass.

A moment later, with both transactions completed, the representative smiled warmly and handed Katie and me our two brand-new, still-warm plastic Virginia identification cards—printed horizontally on the spot, with no red Under-21 banner anywhere in sight and our Arvin Road address gleaming crisply across the front.

11:45 AM — Dropped Off by the Bank on Northbound Military Highway

By eleven-forty-five, after riding the westbound CVTA Route 12 bus back from Buckner Boulevard, I reached up and pulled the yellow chime cord as the bus approached Indian River Road.

On the return trip home, Route 12 dropped us off on the northbound side of South Military Highway right in front of the brick Piedmont Bank branch at the southeast corner of the intersection.

Once the bus ramp folded back inside and the coach pulled away through the traffic light, Katie and I rolled up to the corner curb cut in front of the bank, waited for a clean break in the turning cars, and crossed the unmarked lanes of Indian River Road to the northeast sidewalk.

From there, we made a right onto the sidewalk of Indian River Road—rolling east against the flow of westbound traffic with our new horizontal Virginia State ID cards tucked safely inside our lanyards—and then made a left onto quiet Arvin Road, where our brick ranch house sat waiting for us on our left.

Part 4: The :07 Bus From Glenrock Mall, Yearly Memberships at Fairlawn Rec Center, & The 1977 Building's Quirks

Date: 2007-03-26 at 10:31 America/New_York

Monday, March 26, 2007, 10:31 AM — Catching the :07 Route 25 Past the Newtown Road Border

"Make sure we're on the ten-thirty-one northbound Route 15 and not a minute later," Katie reminded me on Monday morning as we waited side by side in our SwiftChairs at the bus stop on Military Highway and Indian River Road. "If we miss the eleven-oh-seven Route 25 departure out of Glenrock Mall, the eleven-thirty-seven bus turns around at Newtown Road and stays in Norfolk, and we'll be stuck waiting a whole hour until twelve-oh-seven just to cross into Virginia Beach."

"Don't I know it," I said, shaking my head at the folded paper timetable in my hand as the northbound CVTA Route 15 bus pulled up to the curb.

Fourteen minutes later, at ten-forty-five sharp, Route 15 dropped us off at the transit transfer bay outside Glenrock Mall in Norfolk, giving us twenty-two minutes to roll over to the Route 25 stop before the eleven-oh-seven bus pulled out.

On paper, CVTA Route 25 ran every thirty minutes out of Glenrock Mall. In reality—thanks to the infamous city-line service cliff—every second bus only ran as far as Greenwich Road and Newtown Road at the Norfolk border before turning right back around. Only the buses departing Glenrock Mall at seven minutes past the hour, from six-oh-seven in the morning until six-oh-seven in the evening on Monday through Friday, actually crossed the city line and continued all the way down Princess Anne Road to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus.

Boarding the eleven-oh-seven Route 25 side by side, Katie and I rode east across the Newtown Road border and down Princess Anne Road until I pulled the yellow stop cord just before Edwin Drive.

Once the operator lowered the ramp at the corner of Princess Anne Road and Edwin Drive, we rolled our two SwiftChairs side by side down the sidewalk along Edwin Drive, turned onto Marlborough Drive, and steered right into the entrance of Fairlawn Recreation Center—carefully weaving our front casters around the deep, familiar potholes cratering the asphalt parking lot outside the low 1977 brick building with its sloped metal roof.

11:40 AM — Yearly Memberships, The Concrete Spiral Ramp, & Two Locker Room Doors

Rolling through the front entrance doors into the first-floor lobby felt like traveling straight back into our Kempsville childhood.

Right ahead of us on the left stood the wood-laminate front counter, and across the speckled terrazzo floor on the right—wrapping straight around behind the brick elevator enclosure with its key-locked call button—rose the rec center's unmistakable 1977 architectural centerpiece: a massive, unpainted gray concrete ramp with metal pipe railings that climbed from the first floor up to the second and third floors. Because the building had opened in 1977—thirteen years before the Americans with Disabilities Act was ever signed into law—that concrete ramp was nowhere near ADA compliant.

“Two adult resident yearly memberships, please,” Katie smiled up at the recreation clerk behind the front counter, sliding the brand-new horizontal Virginia DMV State ID cards we had just picked up on Buckner Boulevard on Friday alongside our joint debit card across the laminate ledge.

The clerk glanced down at the Virginia Beach street address on Arvin Road printed across both of our IDs, typed our names into the desktop terminal, and had us pause in front of the webcam lens on the counter before handing back two freshly laminated plastic Fairlawn Recreation Center annual passes.

“Welcome back to Fairlawn,” the clerk said, holding up a brass key on a coiled wristband. “Did you two want me to come around and unlock the elevator for you to get up to the second floor, or are your power chairs okay on the concrete ramp?”

“With electric motors and full batteries, we can take the spiral ramp just fine,” I smiled, clipping my new membership card onto my lanyard beside Katie’s. “Wait until you see someone try to push a manual chair up that grade, though.”

Before climbing to the second floor, we took a nostalgic loop down the first-floor wing. Everything about the 1977 building still had the exact endearing, slightly worn neighborhood quirks we remembered from middle and high school. Past the meeting rooms sat the snack lounge, where a hand-lettered paper sign taped across the glass of the vending machines warned patrons in bold marker that the front desk could not issue refunds when the coils ate your dollar bills and that you had to call the vending company’s phone number yourself. Across the hall, we peeked into the Adult Lounge—which had pool tables and board-game tables just like the Youth Lounge down the corridor, minus the arcade cabinets—and rolled past the little two-lane bowling alley, where, right on cue, a laminated yellow sign hung between the ball returns reading LANES CLOSED FOR PINSETTER MAINTENANCE.

“Some things in Kempsville never change,” Katie giggled, squeezing my hand before we steered our SwiftChairs onto the bottom apron of the massive dark-gray concrete spiral ramp.

With our dual electric motors humming steadily against the steep 1970s incline, we spiraled side by side up the concrete helix around the lobby walls to the second-floor check-in desk. Down one corridor sat the open-gym basketball court and the enclosed racquetball court; down the other, through a sudden blast of warm, chlorine-scented air, lay the twenty-five-meter indoor pool, where the air and water stayed at a constant, humid eighty-four degrees while the non-humidified hallway outside sat at a brisk seventy-two.

Standing in the seventy-two-degree corridor between the hallway and the pool deck, however, Katie and I stopped our chairs in front of the two heavy doors leading into the changing area.

The door on the left was marked MEN. The door on the right was marked WOMEN. There was no other changing room anywhere on the floor.

Katie looked at the two separate doors, then looked down at her legs and over at me, the smile fading slightly from her lips.

“Well, that’s going to make swimming here tricky,” Katie said quietly.

At home on Arvin Road, neither of us ever thought twice about getting dressed or undressed because we always had each other right there to steady an elbow, help pull a wet swimsuit strap over a fatigued shoulder, or assist with the transfer bench. Here in the 1977 recreation center, once Katie rolled through the women’s locker room door and I rolled through the men’s door, there was no legal way for a brother and sister to help each other change into swim gear—and out on the pool deck beyond the tile showers, the five-foot-to-eight-foot pool didn’t even have a mechanical transfer chair to lower a wheelchair user into the water.

“For today, we’ve got the Adult Lounge pool tables, the open gym, and our yearly cards in our pockets,” I said, reaching across our armrests to take my sister’s hand as we turned our wheelchairs back toward the top of the concrete spiral ramp to head down and catch the northbound Route 25 back to Glenrock Mall. “And if the two-lane bowling alley downstairs ever actually has both pinsetters working on the same afternoon, we’ll treat it like a holiday.”

A Near-Miss at Dying Glenrock Mall, Locking Down WHOIS, & Forming Our Virginia LLC

Part 1: A Dying Single-Story Mall, Spotting Brenda in the Concourse, & The WHOIS Wake-Up Call

Date: 2007-03-29 at 15:25 America/New_York

Thursday, March 29, 2007, 3:25 PM — Behind the Pillar in a Dying Single-Story Mall

“Nate—stop your chair right now and pull behind this pillar,” Katie whispered sharply at three-twenty-five on Thursday afternoon, her left hand shooting across our armrests to cover my wrist just as we rolled inside the north corridor doors of Glenrock Mall to get out of the chilly March wind while waiting for our three-forty-five southbound Route 15 bus home.

I didn’t ask a single question. Hearing the sudden ice in my twin sister’s voice, I feathered my joystick backward and pivoted my SwiftChair in complete silence beside hers until both of our wheelchairs were tucked squarely behind a wide, beige-tiled structural column next to a lush indoor planter.

Unlike the two-story concourses of Emerald Creek Mall or Chesapeake Bay Mall, Glenrock Mall in 2007 was a sprawling, single-story 1970s shopping center that was visibly dying in slow motion even though its main concourse remained bright, clean, and welcoming under warm overhead skylights. All along the brightly lit single-level corridor stretching toward the center court, more than half of the inline retail storefronts sat closed and empty behind pulled-down security grilles with FOR LEASE signs taped inside the glass—their upper fascism bulkheads marked by faded, ghostly “label scars” in the paint and stucco where the illuminated letters of familiar national chain stores had been unbolted and hauled away. Aside from a discount shoe outlet, a watch-battery kiosk, and a cellphone-case cart in the middle of the polished terrazzo floor, the bright concourse was remarkably quiet.

And standing fifty feet down that single-story concourse in front of the cellphone-case cart—holding two stapled sheets of computer printer paper in her hand—was our estranged mother, Brenda.

My heart slammed against my ribs so hard I could hear my pulse in my ears. Beside me behind the wide column, Katie's hand gripped mine like a vise.

Neither of us had seen our mother's face since late August 2001, when the Virginia Beach court had granted Dad sole custody and exclusive possession after the cruise ship security tape—and the only time we had heard her voice since then was that terrifying Saturday night in August 2003 when she had lurked in the back alley behind the iron fire-escape stairs at Greenway Court in Norfolk while we hid inside our dark square closet.

"They're twenty-one years old—a boy and a girl, twins, blonde hair, both of them in black motorized wheelchairs," Brenda was saying loudly to the bored teenager working the cellphone-case cart, tapping the printed sheets in her hand. "I went by their old building on Greenway Court and up to that dump in Ocean View, and the managers said they moved out! Look at this printout from their little bus website—they wrote right here on Monday that they transfer between Route 15 and Route 25 at Glenrock Mall! You work right by the bus doors, don't you? Have you seen them roll through here today?!"

The teenager behind the cart shrugged his shoulders and shook his head without looking up from his magazine. "Lady, a hundred people walk through those bus doors every hour to catch the 15 and the 20. I don't keep track of who rides the bus."

Behind the beige-tiled pillar, Katie and I didn't breathe a sound.

As Brenda spun around in frustration and marched toward the opposite wing of the single-story concourse to badger the cashier inside the discount shoe store—her back turned completely away from the north entrance—Katie squeezed my fingers twice.

Moving in dead-silent synchronization with our speed dials turned down to a whisper-quiet crawl, we backed our two SwiftChairs ten feet from the column, glided out the automatic glass doors onto the exterior sidewalk apron, and rolled straight down the curb to the Route 15 bus bay just as the three-forty-five southbound bus pulled in from Little Creek Road and kneeled its front suspension.

Not until the hydraulic ramp folded back up, our four-point floor straps clicked tight, and the bus pulled out of the Glenrock Mall ring road onto southbound Military Highway toward Indian River Road did either of us let out the breath we had been holding.

4:15 PM — Checking Our Domain WHOIS Behind a Deadbolted Door

The second we rolled up our aluminum ramp on Arvin Road at four-fifteen, pushed our front door shut, and turned the brass deadbolt, Katie's hands were still trembling.

Before we even touched our computers, the two of us rolled straight down the hallway into our bedroom, helped each other out of our jackets and clothes, climbed inside our shared sleeping bag on the closet floor with the door pulled shut, and held each other skin to skin in the quiet dark for twenty straight minutes until Katie's breathing slowed and the cold knot in my stomach uncoiled.

When we finally dressed and rolled side by side into our dual-desk office at quarter to five, I opened a terminal window on my Linux machine and ran a public WHOIS query on the domain name for Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit.

"Look at the registrant output on my monitor, Katie," I said grimly, pointing at the plain-text lines returned by the public domain registry.

Back in November 2005, when we had registered the domain from our apartment in West Ocean View, the domain registrar had required a registrant mailing address and phone number—and by default, ICANN published that exact record for anyone on the internet to query for free.

"That's how she knew to go to West Ocean View after checking Greenway Court," Katie said, her jaw tightening as she read the screen over my shoulder. "She typed our website name into a public domain lookup, saw the old West Ocean View apartment address on the registration record, went up there after our lease ended on February twenty-eighth, and when the landlord told her we were gone, she started reading our blog posts to see which bus hubs we ride through!"

"Thank goodness we never updated the domain registration to Arvin Road when we got back from Fishersville," I breathed, my skin prickling at how close we had come to handing her a map to Dad's Virginia Beach house. "Because she has no idea this house on Arvin Road even exists. When Dad moved the three of us here in October 2001 after the custody order, she never got this address."

"And she is never going to get it," Katie said fiercely, picking up the desk phone on the table between our chairs and pressing the speed-dial button for Dad's cell phone up in Northern Virginia. "We need to lock down our domain registration today, Nate—and we need a real legal shield so our names and our home street never show up on a public database ever again."

Part 2: Dad's Legal Consultation, Our Virginia LLC, & A Virtual Mailbox at The Parcel Center

Date: 2007-04-03 at 14:00 America/New_York

Tuesday, April 3, 2007, 2:00 PM — The Registered Agent Shield & Prairie Twin Interactive, LLC

"Your father already took care of my consultation fee and the hundred-dollar State Corporation Commission filing fee by credit card this morning," attorney Kenneth Vance said warmly on Tuesday afternoon, sliding a blue legal folder across his ground-floor conference table off Independence Boulevard as Dad listened in over the walnut speakerphone from his lunch break up in Tysons Corner. “And when David told me that Brenda was spotted wandering around Glenrock Mall with a printout from your website trying to figure out where you two live, I pulled the corporate forms immediately.”

Sitting side by side in our SwiftChairs across the mahogany table, Katie and I leaned forward together. Six years earlier, in late August 2001, Mr. Vance was the exact Virginia Beach attorney who had taken Dad’s shipboard security tape into circuit court, won Dad sole custody of the two of us, and secured the divorce stipulation restoring Brenda’s maiden name, Walsh.

“We want to make sure our home street on Arvin Road never appears on a public website lookup, a domain database, or a business license,” Katie told Mr. Vance clearly. “And once we finish our PHP and SQL coursework, we want to be able to build websites and software under a real business name without renting an expensive corporate office suite.”

“Which is the smartest move you can make,” Mr. Vance nodded, opening the folder to the Virginia State Corporation Commission Form LLC-1011, Articles of Organization, alongside a twenty-page Operating Agreement. “Right now, if you register a domain name or accept a check in your personal names from home, anyone who knows how to run a public database search can try to trace your residential address. By forming a Virginia limited liability company—owned strictly fifty-fifty by the two of you as Managing Members—the LLC becomes the legal owner of Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit and every line of software you write.”

He tapped the second paragraph on the state filing sheet with his fountain pen.

“Now look at Box Three and Box Four on the Articles of Organization,” Mr. Vance explained. “Every Virginia LLC is required by statute to list a Registered Agent and a Registered Office address on the public State Corporation Commission database. If you list yourselves as your own Registered Agent, you have to put your home street address on the public state website. Instead, as a member of the Virginia State Bar, I am listing myself as your official Registered Agent and putting this law office right here off Independence Boulevard as your Registered Office.”

“Wait—so if Brenda or anyone else searches our LLC on the state website in Richmond, the only address that comes up is your law office?” I asked, a huge wave of relief washing across my chest.

“My law office, my receptionist, and my security cameras,” Mr. Vance smiled firmly. “And for Box Five—the LLC’s Principal Office mailing address, which you’ll also use for your domain WHOIS records, your bank checks, and your website footer—you don’t need to lease a commercial office building. All you need to do on your way home today is stop at a commercial mail center like The Parcel Center, fill out United States Postal Service Form 1583 with your two Virginia State ID cards, and rent a commercial mailbox for fifteen dollars a month. That gives you a real commercial street address with a suite number. Every piece of business mail and every public WHOIS lookup goes to that suite number, while the two of you do one hundred percent of your work from your dual desks at home.”

“What do you two think of that?” Dad’s voice asked warmly through the speakerphone.

Katie looked at the corporate header printed across the top of the Operating Agreement—PRAIRIE TWIN INTERACTIVE, LLC—and laced her left fingers through my right hand before picking up the blue pen with her right hand.

“We love it, Dad,” Katie said, signing her name cleanly on the first Managing Member line and passing the pen across our armrests to me so I could sign the second fifty-fifty Managing Member line right beside hers.

3:45 PM — Signing Form 1583 at The Parcel Center & Scrubbing Our WHOIS Clean

Forty-five minutes later, on our bus ride back down toward Indian River Road, Katie and I rolled into the storefront of The Parcel Center in the commercial strip plaza near the highway.

Behind the counter, the clerk checked our two laminated Virginia DMV State ID cards, notarized our signatures on United States Postal Service Form 1583, and handed us two small brass mailbox keys along with a printed card showing our new commercial mailing address: a real commercial boulevard street number followed by Suite 214.

The moment we rolled back up our aluminum porch ramp on Arvin Road at four-thirty and deadbolted the door behind us, we wheeled straight into our office bedroom and logged into our domain registrar control panel.

Typing side by side, I replaced our personal names and the old West Ocean View apartment address on every domain record with Prairie Twin Interactive, LLC and our new Suite 214 commercial mailbox address, enabled the registrar’s full WHOIS privacy proxy shield on top of it, and triggered an immediate registry refresh.

When I opened the Linux terminal window sixty seconds later and ran a fresh public WHOIS query on Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit, every trace of our personal names, our phone number, and our residential history had vanished completely from the public internet.

“Go ahead and refresh the page at the library now, Brenda,” Katie whispered, leaning her head against my shoulder as she watched the clean terminal output on my screen. “You’ll never find this house in a million years.”

Twenty-Two in Alexandria: Riding DMV Transit, Touring the White House & the U.S. Capitol, Meeting Senator James West, The Spark to Run for City Council, & Two Blue Passports

Part 1: Accessible Taxi to Newport News, The ARTS Train to Alexandria, & Riding Northern Virginia Transit on Our Twenty-Second Birthday

Date: 2007-04-08 at 09:15 America/New_York

Saturday, April 7 – Sunday, April 8, 2007 — Across the Water to Newport News & Rolling Into Alexandria

“Happy early twenty-second birthday, you two!” Dad beamed on Saturday afternoon, standing right beside the blue mobile wheelchair lift on the red-brick platform of Alexandria Union Station as the ARTS conductor lowered Katie and me down from the stainless-steel vestibule of the Northeast Regional.

“Dad!” Katie grinned, releasing her joystick brake the second the lift apron touched the brick and rolling straight into his outstretched arms while I wheeled right up beside her for a three-way platform hug.

“How was the ride up from Newport News?” Dad asked, slinging both of our overnight duffel bags—including our rolled-up double sleeping bag—over his shoulders.

“Smooth as glass once we got across the harbor,” I told him as we rolled side by side along the station platform toward the short pedestrian sidewalk running beneath the King Street railroad bridge.

Because Norfolk still had zero passenger rail service in 2007—forcing anyone on the Southside who wanted to catch an ARTS train to cross the water to the Peninsula—Dad had pre-paid a wheelchair-accessible lift taxi van to pick Katie and me up at our driveway on Arvin Road at six-thirty that morning and drive us through the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel straight to the Newport News ARTS station on Warwick Boulevard. Since Newport News was the origin terminal for the morning train, the crew had plenty of time to wheel the station lift up to the accessible coach door, lock our SwiftChairs into the wide wheelchair bays across from the café car, and let us watch the Chickahominy swamps, the state capitol domes of Richmond, and the Rappahannock River bridges roll past our window all the way up to Northern Virginia.

Even better, when we rolled with Dad through the short underpass beneath the railroad tracks and emerged onto the west side of the tunnel, Dad’s two-story brick house on Sunset Drive sat right there at the foot of the hill—less than three minutes from both the ARTS train platforms and the elevated Capital Transit Yellow and Blue Line station at King Street.

Inside the house, Dad had already set up the ground-floor front room for us with a portable aluminum threshold ramp over the front step, a roll-in shower bench in the downstairs bathroom, and a cleared, freshly vacuumed first-floor coat and linen closet where we immediately spread out our sleeping bag and four pillows. Before we even unpacked our clothes, Katie and I proudly pulled out our lanyards at the dining table to show Dad the brand-new horizontal Virginia State ID cards we had gotten on Buckner Boulevard—both still showing our uninterrupted Arvin Road address from 2001, with the red Under-21 banners officially gone for good. That night—our last night of being twenty-one—after eating Dad’s homemade lasagna at the dining table, Katie and I slipped into that quiet downstairs closet, zipped our sleeping bag up around our shoulders, and slept skin to skin in each other’s arms without a single worry in the world.

Sunday, April 8, 2007, 10:30 AM — High-Platform Level Boarding & A Transit Grid That Doesn't Quit at Dinner

When we woke up on Sunday morning, April 8—officially twenty-two years old—Dad was standing in the kitchen holding two mugs of hot chocolate and two crisp plastic Capital Transit CapitalPass farecards loaded with a full week of unlimited rail and bus passes.

"For your twenty-second birthday week," Dad announced, handing one plastic card to Katie and one to me, "before we head into Washington on Tuesday for your big birthday surprise, we're going to spend today riding the buses and trains up here in Northern Virginia so the authors of Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit can see how a connected regional network operates."

Twenty minutes later, the three of us rolled across the bus loop to the King Street Capital Transit station, tapped our plastic farecards against the accessible wide-aisle faregate pads, rode the glass elevator up to the center island platform, and waited as a six-car Yellow Line train glided to a halt alongside the concrete edge.

When the bi-parting metal doors slid open, Katie and I both stared at the threshold between the station platform and the railcar floor.

The concrete platform sat at the exact vertical height of the train floor. There were no steps, no steep ramps, and no waiting ten minutes for an operator to unfold a mechanical lift.

Katie pushed her joystick forward, and her front casters glided straight across the two-inch rubber gap-filler strip into the railcar alongside mine in less than two seconds.

"Did you just see that, Nate?!" Katie gasped, her eyes shining as the chime sounded and the doors closed behind us. "We just rolled straight onto a train by ourselves in two seconds flat! And look at our farecards—when you transfer from the train to a local Alexandria or Arlington bus at the station loop, the electronic reader automatically discounts the transfer instead of handing you a soggy paper slip that expires while you wait for an hourly bus!"

All Sunday afternoon and evening, Dad took us everywhere across Alexandria and Arlington: riding the Blue and Yellow Lines up past National Airport and Pentagon City, transferring seamlessly onto low-floor local buses with working automated stop announcements and paved curb-cut boarding pads at every single corner, and eating our twenty-second birthday dinner together at a bright restaurant near Old Town at eight o'clock at night.

When we finished our birthday cake at quarter past nine on a Sunday night and rolled back out to the street, buses were still pulling up to the illuminated shelters every fifteen minutes, and trains were still running overhead in both directions until midnight.

"Look at the clock on my phone, Nate," Katie said softly as we rolled off the nine-thirty bus at King Street and headed through the underpass back to Dad's house on Sunset Drive. "It's nine-thirty on a Sunday night, and families, restaurant workers, and people in wheelchairs are still riding buses and trains home without a single worry about getting stranded. Why can't Hampton Roads have this?"

Part 2: Unclipping Our Backpacks, Where Is President George W. Walker Today?, & The White House Tour That Sparked a Political Calling

Date: 2007-04-10 at 08:15 America/New_York

Tuesday, April 10, 2007, 8:15 AM — Unclipping Our Wheelchair Backpacks on Sunset Drive

“Hold it right there before you two roll out the front door,” Dad said with a grin at eight-fifteen on Tuesday morning in the hallway of his brick house on Sunset Drive, holding up the printed instruction sheet from Senator James West’s office. “Rule number one on the Secret Service boarding sheet: zero backpacks, zero bags, zero cameras, and zero cell phones allowed inside the White House—and there are no storage lockers at the gate.”

Katie glanced back over her shoulder at the black nylon backpack clipped to the backrest of her SwiftChair—where we normally carried our spare chargers, rain ponchos, and notebooks—and then looked over at mine.

“Not even a wheelchair bag?” I asked, reaching behind Katie’s backrest so we could unbuckle each other’s straps.

“Not in 2007,” Dad said, helping me lift Katie’s backpack off her frame while she unclipped mine and set both bags neatly beside the hall coat rack. “If you show up at the East Wing gate on Fifteenth Street with a bag or a camera, the Secret Service turns you right around, and the nearest place to rent a storage locker is all the way over at Union Station. All the three of us need in our pockets today are our CapitalPass transit cards, our White House tour confirmation letter, and those brand-new horizontal Virginia State ID cards of yours.”

“Good thing we spent three hours at the Buckner Boulevard DMV waiting on tickets B042 and B043,” Katie laughed, patting her wallet pocket as our chairs felt noticeably lighter without our everyday packs hanging behind our shoulders.

As we rolled side by side through the King Street railroad underpass toward the Blue Line platform on a crisp April morning, Katie looked up at Dad with genuine curiosity.

“How on earth did you manage to score three confirmed passes to tour the White House on three weeks’ notice anyway, Dad?” she asked.

“By writing to our brand-new Senator from Virginia,” Dad smiled as the elevator doors opened onto the King Street platform. “When you two decided in March to move back to Arvin Road and we planned this birthday week up here, I sent constituent tour requests to Capitol Hill. Everyone in Virginia knows our senior Senator, Senator John Warren, is an institution in the Senate, of course, and his office was booked solid with spring school trips—but our newly sworn-in junior Senator, Senator James West, just took office in January and wanted to prove right out of the gate that his office answers every constituent letter. His constituent-services director called me back personally within forty-eight hours, submitted our security clearance numbers to the Secret Service for a nine-thirty White House tour, and invited us up to his Senate office this afternoon to watch the Senate in session.”

Katie looked down at the embossed tour pass in her hand, her blue eyes widening with quiet respect. “A brand-new United States Senator actually had his office call a regular family back in two days just to help two twins in wheelchairs see the White House and the Capitol?”

“Sure did,” Dad said warmly as the northbound Blue Line train glided up to the platform edge. “And his staff told me he wants to step out of his office and say hello to you two himself when we pick up our gallery passes this afternoon.”

9:25 AM — Flashing Our Horizontal State IDs at the East Wing & Where President George W. Walker Is Today

At nine-twenty-five, after riding the Blue Line elevator up to the sidewalk at McPherson Square and rolling two blocks down Fifteenth Street alongside the black wrought-iron perimeter fence of the White House grounds, the three of us approached the uniformed Secret Service checkpoint at the East Wing visitor entrance.

Side by side, Katie and I reached into our wallets and handed our brand-new horizontal twenty-one-and-over Virginia State ID cards up to the uniformed Secret Service officer at the podium.

The officer held Katie’s horizontal card and then mine alongside the cleared manifest clipboards, checked our photographs and our April 8, 1985 birthdates, and smiled down at both of us without a single blink.

“Katie Prairie and Nathaniel Prairie from Virginia Beach,” the officer said, handing our horizontal IDs back to us. “Happy twenty-second birthday to both of you, and welcome to the White House. Because you’re in power wheelchairs, Officer Henderson right inside the East Wing doors will take your family up the accessible ramp and the visitor elevator so you don’t miss a single room on the route.”

“Thank you, sir,” Katie and I said together, tucking our horizontal State ID cards proudly back into our pockets as we rolled smoothly through the security pavilion and into the wood-paneled East Wing lobby.

Inside, a tall Uniformed Secret Service Tour Officer with a polished gold badge on his navy lapel—Officer Henderson—greeted the three of us warmly and guided our two SwiftChairs up the interior accessible ramp into the vaulted Ground Floor Corridor beneath the Executive Residence.

As our small tour group paused outside the Vermeil Room—lined with gilded silver services and portraits of First Ladies—and then looked into the red-and-cream China Room and the book-lined White House Library, a father standing next to us in a lightweight jacket raised his hand.

“Excuse me, Officer,” the man asked hopefully. “Is there any chance our tour group might catch a glimpse of President Walker walking down the hallway today?”

Officer Henderson chuckled good-naturedly—the practiced, polite laugh of an officer who heard that exact question twenty times a morning.

“I always hate to disappoint folks on their first trip, sir, but White House public tours almost never cross paths with the President,” Officer Henderson explained warmly, gesturing toward the west end of the vaulted corridor. “Even when the President is here at the complex, his working offices are over in the West Wing, and the First Family’s private living quarters are upstairs on the Second and Third Floors—completely separate from the historic Ground Floor and State Floor reception rooms we tour here.”

“Wait—doesn’t the flag on the roof tell you whether the President is home, like Buckingham Palace?” the man’s teenage son asked.

“A lot of people think that, actually, because of the movies,” Officer Henderson smiled, shaking his head. “By federal law, the American flag over the White House flies twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, whether the President is in Washington or halfway around the world. If you want to know the real insider secret for whether the President is working in the Oval Office, you look over at the exterior portico door of the West Wing. Whenever the President is physically inside the West Wing, a United States Marine sentry in full dress blues stands at rigid attention right outside that door. The minute the President leaves the West Wing—either to travel or to walk back to the Residence for the night—the Marine sentry steps down.”

“And how do the reporters know when he’s done with public appearances for the whole day?” Katie asked curiously from her wheelchair.

“That’s called ‘calling a lid,’” Officer Henderson answered with an appreciative nod toward Katie. “Whenever the President is finished with all public appearances, speeches, and travel for the day, the Press Secretary’s office gets on the loudspeaker in the press briefing room and announces a ‘travel and photo lid.’ Once a lid is called, everyone knows the President is in for the evening and won’t be seen in public again until morning. Today, though, there’s no Marine sentry at the West Wing door for the opposite reason—President George W. Walker isn’t even in the District of Columbia right now.”

“Where is he today?” I asked.

“President Walker flew back late last night from Yuma, Arizona, where he spent Monday touring the southwestern border,” Officer Henderson replied, leading our three-person family over to the wood-paneled Visitor Elevator so we could ride up to the State Floor while the walking group climbed the marble stairs. “And about twenty minutes ago, he headed across the Potomac River into Northern Virginia—right over to American Legion Post 177 in Fairfax, Virginia—to deliver a ten-fifteen address to military families and veterans on the emergency supplemental appropriations bill.”

Inside the elevator cab, I leaned across our inner armrests, wrapped my arm around Katie’s shoulders in a quick, warm squeeze, and whispered against her cheek with a grin.

“Hold on, Katie,” I murmured as she leaned into my hug. “We rode the CCT bus right through the middle of Fairfax two days ago on our birthday, and today President Walker is in Fairfax while we’re inside his house!”

Katie had to press her lips together to keep from laughing out loud as the brass elevator doors slid open onto the State Floor.

10:05 AM — FDR's Wheelchair in the East Room, John Adams's Prayer in the State Dining Room, & The Spark Inside Katie

When we rolled out of the elevator into the vast, sunlit expanse of the East Room—with its gleaming oak parquet floors, gold silk damask draperies, and three towering Bohemian cut-glass chandeliers overhead—the lighthearted humor in Katie's eyes gave way to sudden, breathtaking awe.

Officer Henderson walked beside our chairs across the polished floor, pausing beneath the full-length 1797 Gilbert Stuart portrait of George Washington—the famous canvas Dolley Madison had ordered unscrewed from the wall and carried to safety before British troops burned the White House in August 1814.

Then Officer Henderson looked down at Katie's and my two black SwiftChairs and pointed toward the wide, flush oak thresholds connecting the rooms along the State Floor.

"A lot of visitors don't realize it when they walk through these rooms," Officer Henderson told the three of us quietly, "but for twelve consecutive years—from March 1933 until April 1945, through the depths of the Great Depression and the entirety of the Second World War—the President of the United States governed this country from a wheelchair right across these exact parquet floors. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt had wooden ramps built over the thresholds of the East Wing and the State Floor long before accessibility laws existed, and he held his regular press conferences and wartime briefings right in these halls. And decades later, the coalition work that led to President George H.W. Walker signing the Americans with Disabilities Act out on the South Lawn on July 26, 1990 came right through these doors."

Beside me, Katie's left hand found my right hand between our armrests and held on tight. Looking down at the oak parquet under her front casters—realizing that a President in a wheelchair had steered the United States through its darkest twentieth-century hours across the very floorboards beneath our tires—made the room feel less like a glass museum case and more like a living workshop of history.

From the East Room, we rolled side by side through the silk-walled Green Room—Thomas Jefferson's old dining room—and into the oval Blue Room at the center of the South Portico, looking out the tall floor-to-ceiling windows across the South Lawn toward the Jefferson Memorial gleaming beyond the Tidal Basin. Passing through the parlor walls of the Empire-furnished Red Room, we rolled into the final major room on the State Floor: the State Dining Room.

Even with the velvet tour rope guiding visitors toward the Cross Hall, Officer Henderson let the three of us pause for a full minute in front of the carved white marble fireplace mantel on the west wall.

Above the mantel hung George Peter Alexander Healy's portrait of Abraham Lincoln seated in quiet, heavy contemplation, his chin resting on his hand as he carried the weight of a divided nation. Directly beneath the portrait, carved into the stone frieze of the fireplace mantel at President Franklin Roosevelt's direction, were the words President John Adams had written to his wife Abigail on his second night in the unfinished White House in November 1800:

I Pray Heaven to Bestow the Best of Blessings on THIS HOUSE and on All that shall hereafter Inhabit it. May none but Honest and Wise Men ever Rule under This Roof.

I turned my head to look at my twin sister.

Katie wasn't just admiring the painting or the gilded molding like a tourist anymore. Her posture in her SwiftChair was bolt upright, her blue eyes fixed on Lincoln's portrait and the carved words beneath it with a fierce, luminous intensity I had never seen on her face before.

As we rolled out through the red-carpeted Cross Hall between the marble columns and emerged through the Entrance Hall onto the accessible ramp of the North Portico overlooking Pennsylvania Avenue, Dad noticed the quiet fire in Katie's eyes too.

"You grew awfully quiet back there in the State Dining Room, Katie," Dad said gently as we paused on the North Portico driveway in the April sunshine. "What were you thinking about?"

Katie looked back up at the white sandstone columns of the North Portico and then down at our two wheelchairs resting side by side on the pavement.

"All my life, Dad," Katie said, her voice steady and almost startled by its own clarity, "whenever people on television talked about the White House or the government, it always felt like some distant planet run by people who didn't live in the real world we live in. Being inside those rooms—seeing the floors where President Roosevelt rolled his wheelchair, reading John Adams's prayer carved into that stone mantel, and realizing how many laws that affect every single day of our lives were signed or vetoed behind those walls—just made something click in my head."

She looked straight at me, her fingers still linked with mine.

"The people who govern in rooms like that aren't magical beings, Nate," Katie said softly. "They're just citizens who showed up and ran for office. And when people who ride public buses and use wheelchairs aren't in the room when the decisions get made, nobody speaks for us."

Part 3: Beneath the Capitol Dome: Touring the Crypt, the Rotunda, National Statuary Hall, & the Historic Old Senate Chamber

Date: 2007-04-10 at 11:30 America/New_York

Tuesday, April 10, 2007, 11:30 AM — The Capitol Police Checkpoint & The Compass Stone in the Crypt

From McPherson Square, the three of us rode the Capital Transit Blue Line beneath the National Mall to Capitol South Station, took the street elevator up to First Street SE in the late-morning sunshine, and rolled up the wide, curved walkways of Capitol Hill.

Because the new underground Capitol Visitor Center on the East Front was still a massive fenced construction site in the spring of 2007, constituent tours entered through the accessible South Wing pavilion near Garfield Circle. Waiting right inside the accessible entrance with three yellow visitor badges was a cheerful twenty-three-year-old staff assistant from Senator James West's office named Marcus, standing alongside a gray-haired historian wearing the unmistakable crimson-red blazer of the United States Capitol Guide Service.

"Welcome to the United States Capitol, Mr. Prairie, Katie, and Nathaniel," the U.S. Capitol Police officer at the screening table smiled as Katie and I proudly handed over our new horizontal twenty-one-and-over Virginia State ID cards for the second time that morning. "Still no bags or backpacks, I see—you two are making my job easy today! Right through the wide gate and enjoy your tour."

Once we clipped our visitor passes to our collars, our red-blazered Capitol Guide—Mr. Galloway—led the three of us and Marcus onto the elevator up to the first floor and out into the circular sandstone colonnade of the Capitol Crypt.

Forty massive Doric columns of Virginia Aquia Creek sandstone rose around us, supporting the vaulted groin arches that held up the weight of the Rotunda floor directly overhead.

"Roll right over here to the center of the ring," Mr. Galloway invited us, gesturing toward a sunken white marble star set inside a brass ring in the center of the stone floor. "Right beneath your wheels is the Compass Stone—the exact geographic zero-point dividing Washington, D.C. into its four quadrants: Northwest, Northeast, Southwest, and Southeast. Every street address in the federal capital is measured outward from this single stone."

Katie positioned her SwiftChair beside the brass ring so her front right caster rested on the Northeast line while mine rested on the Southeast line, reaching across her armrest to lace her fingers with mine.

"Think about the sandstone in these forty columns, too," Dad remarked, running his hand admiringly along the warm, fossil-flecked grain of one of the pillars. "Quarried down on Aquia Creek in Stafford County, Virginia, and barged up the Potomac River more than two hundred years ago."

12:00 PM — Looking Up Into the Capitol Rotunda

A two-minute elevator ride brought the five of us up to the second floor, and when the bronze doors slid open and Katie and I rolled side by side through the sandstone archway into the United States Capitol Rotunda, both of us tilted our heads all the way back against our headrests in stunned silence.

Rising one hundred and eighty feet straight above our wheelchairs was the soaring white cast-iron canopy of the Capitol Dome, flooded with midday sunlight streaming through the ring of tall peristyle windows. At the very crown of the oculus, Constantino Brumidi's fresco—The Apotheosis of Washington—seemed to float in midair above the continuous three-hundred-foot painted stone belt of the Frieze of American History.

Around the curved sandstone walls at floor level hung eight monumental historical oil paintings in heavy gilded frames, four of them painted from life by John Trumbull, who had served as George Washington's own aide-de-camp during the Revolutionary War.

While other tourists snapped photos of Declaration of Independence, Katie rolled her SwiftChair slowly across the flagstones to stop directly in front of two paintings side by side: Surrender of Lord Cornwallis, painted on the fields of Yorktown just thirty-five miles up the road from our home in Virginia Beach, and General George Washington Resigning His Commission at Annapolis in December 1783.

"Most visitors walk right past that fourth Trumbull painting on their way to Statuary Hall," Mr. Galloway observed approvingly, stepping up beside Katie's wheelchair and Dad. "Do you know why historians consider General George Washington Resigning His Commission the most important painting in the entire Rotunda?"

"Because he gave the power back," Katie answered immediately, her eyes fixed on the painted parchment scroll in Washington's outstretched hand. "He had the Continental Army behind him, and he could have stayed in power for life like a king—Wait, that's what King George III said when they told him Washington was going to resign and go home to Mount Vernon, isn't it? That if he did that, he would be the greatest man in the world?"

Mr. Galloway beamed from ear to ear. "Spot-on! In a republic, the highest office in the land doesn't belong to the person holding the commission—it's held in trust for the people and returned to civilian hands under the Constitution."

12:35 PM — John Quincy Adams's Whisper Spot in National Statuary Hall & The Historic Old Senate Chamber

Rolling south through the tall bronze doors out of the Rotunda, we entered the semicircular Greek Revival amphitheater of National Statuary Hall—the original chamber of the House of Representatives from 1807 until 1857, ringed with marble and bronze statues contributed by the states.

Mr. Galloway guided Katie's and my wheelchairs over to a small brass plaque embedded in the black-and-white marble tiles on the east side of the floor, stamped with the name JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"Wait right here on this brass marker, Katie and Nathaniel," Mr. Galloway said with a twinkle in his eye, walking thirty-five feet away across the crowded floor toward the opposite side of the hall and turning his back to us.

Even with dozens of visitors talking across the room, Mr. Galloway's softest whisper traveled up the curved parabolic ceiling, bounced across the plaster arch overhead, and dropped straight down into Katie's and my ears as clearly as if he were leaning over our armrests:

"When John Quincy Adams served in the House of Representatives after leaving the Presidency, he sat at this exact desk—and he could hear every word the opposing party whispered on the other side of the chamber!"

Katie and I both grinned across the hall at him as Dad laughed out loud.

Before we headed through the underground tunnel to grab lunch in the Senate cafeteria prior to our one-forty-five appointment with Senator West, Marcus and Mr. Galloway took us on one final elevator ride up to the semicircular gallery entrance of the historic Old Senate Chamber—the intimate, crimson-and-gold room where the United States Senate had debated the fate of the Union from 1810 until 1859, and where the Supreme Court of the United States had subsequently sat for seventy-five years until 1935.

Looking across the two curved tiers of polished mahogany desks toward the crimson silk canopy and the gilded wooden eagle perched above the Vice President's dais, Katie asked Marcus and Mr. Galloway a question that made both men pause.

"When a bill comes to the Senate today," Katie asked, pointing toward the front row of desks, "how much of the actual text gets written during the speeches on the floor versus inside the committee rooms before the cameras ever turn on?"

"Ninety-five percent of it happens in committee and subcommittee markups, Katie," Marcus answered honestly, impressed by the question. "Floor speeches get the headlines on the six-o'clock news, but the Senators who sit down in committee, read every line of the statutory formulas, and write the amendments are the ones who actually decide whether a transit agency gets funded or a ramp gets built."

Katie nodded slowly, filing every word of that answer away inside her memory as we turned our chairs toward the elevator.

Part 4: Meeting Senator James West, Watching the U.S. Senate From the Gallery, & Why Can't We Ride the Bus to City Hall?

Date: 2007-04-10 at 13:45 America/New_York

Tuesday, April 10, 2007, 1:45 PM — Meeting Senator James West & Riding the Capitol Subway

At one-forty-five, after eating lunch with Dad in the Senate cafeteria, the three of us rolled down the marble corridor of the Senate Office Building and turned through the tall wooden double doors of United States Senator James West's suite, where the Great Seal of the Commonwealth of Virginia hung beside the entrance.

Before the receptionist had even finished handing us our three blue cardboard United States Senate Gallery passes, the inner door of the Senator's private office opened—and out walked Senator James West himself in his dark navy suit and striped tie.

He didn't stand stiffly behind a rope line or talk exclusively to Dad over our heads the way so many adults did when they saw two twenty-two-year-old twins in motorized wheelchairs. Instead, Senator West walked straight across the reception carpet to our chairs, leaned down to look Katie and me directly in the eyes, and shook Katie's hand and then mine with a firm, warm grip.

"Katie and Nathaniel, happy twenty-second birthday, and welcome to Washington," Senator West said in his steady Virginia cadence. "My staff told me the two of you just finished your computer science degrees down at the Community College of Hampton Roads in Norfolk, started your own vocational software course, and run your own regional transit blog down at the coast. How did the White House and the Capitol Rotunda treat you this morning?"

"They were unforgettable, Senator West," Katie said, her voice clear and earnest as she shook his hand. "Thank you so much for having your office arrange our passes. We couldn't believe how quickly your staff called our dad back."

"Don't ever let anyone tell you that these buildings belong to the lobbyists or the politicians, Katie," Senator West told her, looking from Katie's eyes to mine and then up at Dad. "The United States Capitol belongs to the people of the United States—and my number-one job as your Senator from Virginia is making sure when constituents from Virginia Beach knock on this door, somebody answers. I have to head over to the floor in ten minutes to speak on the transportation and veterans' appropriations bill, so I'm going to have Marcus take the three of you down to the Capitol subway right now so you can watch the live session from the front row of the gallery."

Watching a sitting United States Senator take the time in the middle of a busy legislative afternoon to look us directly in the eyes and remind us that the Capitol belonged to the constituents who knocked on its door left an impression on my sister that neither of us would ever forget.

Five minutes later, Marcus escorted the three of us down the elevator to the bright underground tunnel of the Capitol Subway system, guided our two SwiftChairs onto the level accessible car of the electric subway tram, and rode with us beneath Constitution Avenue straight into the basement of the Senate Wing.

2:10 PM — Looking Down From the Third-Floor U.S. Senate Gallery

Riding the Senate wing elevator up to the third floor, we followed the gallery doorkeeper's quiet hand signals through the heavy padded double doors of the Visitors' Gallery and rolled our two SwiftChairs side by side into the level wheelchair alcove overlooking the United States Senate Chamber.

The moment we looked over the brass-and-mahogany balcony railing, Katie's breath caught audibly in her throat.

Directly below us stretched the four semicircular tiers of a hundred historic mahogany desks arranged across the blue patterned carpet of the Senate floor. Down at the tiered marble rostrum, the presiding officer's gavel tapped once, the reading clerk called out the number of a pending amendment, and Senators rose behind their desks—including Senator James West and senior Senator John Warren on the Virginia aisle—to debate federal transit formula grants and veterans' medical care in live session.

When Senator James West rose behind his desk to speak, he glanced up briefly toward the third-floor gallery alcove where the three of us were sitting and gave a subtle, respectful nod before addressing the Chair.

For forty-five straight minutes, Katie didn't look away from the Senate floor once. She leaned slightly forward in her SwiftChair, her left hand resting warmly over mine on my armrest, watching how a single elected voice standing behind a mahogany desk could force an entire chamber—and an entire federal agency—to put its numbers on the public record and vote in the daylight.

8:30 PM — Back at Dad's Dining Table in Alexandria: The 5:30 PM Last Bus Home & How to Run for City Council

That evening, after eating dinner near Capitol Hill and riding the Yellow Line train across the Potomac River bridge to King Street at eight-fifteen—transferring effortlessly onto a local evening bus just to see the neighborhood loop before rolling through the railroad underpass and retrieving our wheelchair backpacks inside Dad's brick house on Sunset Drive—Katie didn't head straight for the downstairs closet to rest.

Instead, she rolled her SwiftChair right up to Dad's dining table, opened her silver laptop beside mine, and pulled up two browser tabs side by side: the official meeting calendar of the Virginia Beach City Council, and the printed PDF timetables for Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Routes 12 and 33.

Dad walked in from the kitchen carrying three tall glasses of cold ginger ale, set them on coasters, and looked at the fierce, concentrated expression on my sister's face. "What are you looking at on there, Katie?"

Katie turned her laptop screen slightly so Dad and I could both see it, and her voice was shaking with genuine, righteous anger.

"Look at what the three of us just did tonight here in Alexandria and Washington, Dad," Katie said, tapping the corner of her keyboard. "Today we toured the White House, toured the Capitol Rotunda and Statuary Hall, watched the United States Senate in session from the gallery, ate dinner at seven-thirty, and rode public trains and buses all the way back to Sunset Drive at eight-thirty at night without a single problem. Now look at the schedule back home in Virginia Beach—the largest city in the entire Commonwealth of Virginia!"

She pointed her finger at the Virginia Beach City Council schedule on the left half of her screen, and then at the CVTA bus timetable on the right half.

"Virginia Beach City Council formal evening sessions and public-comment hearings down at the Municipal Center start at six o'clock in the evening," Katie said, her blue eyes flashing. "If Nate and I want to ride the bus from Arvin Road down to City Hall to speak to our own City Council during a six-o'clock meeting, we have to take Route 12 to the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus hub and transfer to Route 33 down to the Municipal Center. Now look at the return schedule from the Municipal Center!"

I leaned in over my armrest and read the black-and-white timetable columns aloud with her.

“To get back to the CCHR hub in time to connect to Route 12, Route 25, or Route 29,” I said, “you have to leave the Municipal Center on the five-thirty PM Route 33 bus—because the very last Route 12 bus back to Indian River Road and Military Highway leaves CCHR at five-forty-eight PM!”

“Five-thirty PM!” Katie repeated, slapping her palm lightly against the tabletop. “City Council meetings start at six o’clock, and the last bus home for a citizen who needs to connect at CCHR leaves City Hall at five-thirty—thirty minutes before the meeting even starts! And even if you live right on Route 33 and don’t have to transfer at CCHR, the last northbound bus going all the way to Sixty-Eighth Street leaves the Municipal Center at six-oh-one PM—one minute after the Mayor bangs the gavel! If you rely on a bus in Virginia Beach, you are literally locked out of attending your own City Council meetings unless you want to get stranded fifteen miles from home in the dark!”

Dad sat down in the wooden chair across from us, resting his forearms on the table as he looked at Katie. “And because none of the people sitting on the Virginia Beach City Council ever ride a bus, none of them even notices—or cares—that the schedule locks bus riders out of City Hall.”

Katie stared at the screen for a long, quiet moment—remembering President Roosevelt’s wheelchair path across the State Floor of the White House, the portrait of Abraham Lincoln above John Adams’s carved prayer, the hundred mahogany desks she had looked down upon from the United States Senate Gallery that afternoon, and the words Senator James West had spoken to us in his reception room: Don’t ever let anyone tell you that these buildings belong to the lobbyists or the politicians.

Then Katie opened a third browser tab and typed a search query into the address bar: Commonwealth of Virginia State Board of Elections Candidate Qualification Guide — City Council.

“What are you pulling up now, Katie?” I asked softly, rolling my chair flush against hers.

“How old you have to be, how many registered voter signatures you need on a petition, and what forms you have to file to run for the Virginia Beach City Council,” Katie answered, her voice steady as steel as the PDF loaded on her screen. “Look right here under Code of Virginia Section 24.2-501: eighteen years old, a qualified voter registered at your residential address in the Kempsville District—which we’ve had on our Virginia State ID cards and voter registration on Arvin Road since 2001—and one hundred twenty-five certified voter signatures. If the politicians on the Virginia Beach City Council won’t ride the bus or let bus riders attend their six-o’clock meetings, Nate, then we’re going to learn every rule in this book, and I’m going to run for City Council so we can make the changes from the inside.”

Flipping up the inner armrest between our two SwiftChairs, I leaned across and wrapped both arms tightly around my twin sister’s shoulders. Katie exhaled a long, slow breath and buried her face against my neck, wrapping her arms around my chest as the familiar, steady deep pressure of our embrace settled our racing nerves—and twenty minutes later, inside the quiet, dark sanctuary of Dad’s downstairs bedroom closet, we fell asleep cuddled up together inside our shared sleeping bag with the future of Virginia Beach already taking shape in our minds.

Part 5:

Date: 2007-04-19 at 13:15 America/New_York

Thursday, April 19, 2007, 1:15 PM — "What's This?" and Why We Wanted Passports

"Wait a second—what's this?" the young teller behind the counter at the neighborhood bank branch asked on Thursday afternoon, squinting down at the brand-new horizontal plastic card I had just slid under the acrylic window alongside our business checking signature card. "Do you have a driver's license?"

Sitting right beside my left wheel, Katie let out a slow, measured breath through her nose.

"It's a Virginia State ID card," I told the teller patiently, tapping my finger against the words COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA — IDENTIFICATION CARD printed in bold letters across the top of the laminate. "It's issued by the Virginia Department of Motor Vehicles, and it's an official state identification card."

"Oh!" the teller blinked, glancing down through the glass partition at the two black motorized wheelchairs Katie and I were sitting in before her cheeks turned pink. "Right—sorry about that! I'm just so used to looking at driver's licenses all day that the top banner threw me off."

Every single adult who doesn't drive knows that exact moment. On paper, under every state and federal statute in America, a valid DMV-issued State ID card is 100 percent equal to a driver's license for proving who you are. In the real world, however, an astonishing number of clerks, tellers, and receptionists stare at a State ID card as if you just handed them a laminated grocery-store coupon and ask, "What's this?" until you explain to them that it is, in fact, an ID card.

As we rolled out of the bank lobby onto the sidewalk ten minutes later, Katie looked over at me with her mind already made up.

"You know what we're doing this afternoon while we're already out on the bus, don't you, Nate?" Katie asked.

"Getting United States Passports?" I grinned.

"Getting United States Passports," Katie declared firmly. "First of all, after riding the ARTS train up to Alexandria and Washington last week, I want the two of us to have real passports so if we ever decide to take the train all the way up to Montreal or Toronto—or fly across the Atlantic one day—we don't have to wait three months for paperwork. And second of all, I would love to see anybody in the Commonwealth of Virginia look at an official United States Passport with the gold eagle on the cover and ask us, 'What's this?""

2:30 PM — Form DS-11, Two-by-Two Photos, & Raising Our Right Hands at the Post Office

That afternoon, back at our dual-desk office on Arvin Road, Katie and I downloaded two copies of U.S. Department of State Form DS-11—the official Application for a U.S. Passport for first-time adult applicants—and filled out every box in black ink, carefully leaving the signature line at the bottom blank just as the instructions required until we were right in front of an authorized Acceptance Agent.

From the fireproof steel document box Dad kept in the hall linen closet, we pulled out our original certified Commonwealth of Virginia birth certificates with the raised embossed seals from the Division of Vital Records in Richmond, tucked them into a rigid manila folder alongside our horizontal Virginia State ID cards and our checkbook, and rode the bus over to the U.S. Post Office passport window.

“Two first-time adult passport applications and two sets of passport photos, please,” Katie told the uniformed postal acceptance clerk at two-thirty as we rolled our SwiftChairs side by side up to the passport counter.

“You two came prepared,” the postal clerk smiled, checking our unsigned DS-11 forms and our raised-seal birth certificates before sliding a white pull-down screen down behind the end of the counter. “Roll right over here in front of the white screen one at a time so I can take your two-by-two photos. Chin level, shoulders square to the lens, and give me a natural look looking straight into the camera.”

Because the backs of our SwiftChairs came up behind our shoulders in dark black upholstery, the clerk angled the camera slightly downward at seated eye level so the two-inch-by-two-inch frame captured our heads and shoulders cleanly against the plain white backdrop.

While the photo printer behind the counter spat out two glossy sheets of twin two-by-two portraits and the clerk trimmed them with a heavy metal die-cutter, a newer postal clerk at the adjacent register leaned over to glance at the two horizontal Virginia cards Katie and I had laid on the counter.

“Wait—what kind of cards are those?” the trainee clerk asked, squinting at the lack of a driver-class code.

Katie and I looked at each other and burst out laughing at the exact same second.

“They’re Virginia State ID cards,” Katie told him cheerfully. “And in about ten weeks, we’re going to have two blue books to go right alongside them.”

“Don’t mind him—state IDs are 100 percent valid primary photo identification for a DS-11,” our passport acceptance clerk chuckled, copying our Virginia ID numbers onto the verification block of our applications and stapling one two-by-two photo to Katie’s form and one to mine.

She turned both clipboards around on the lowered counter and handed us each a black ballpoint pen.

“All right, Katie and Nathaniel—please raise your right hands,” the clerk said officially. “Do you solemnly swear or affirm that the statements made on this application are true and that the photograph attached is a true likeness of yourself?”

“I do,” Katie and I said together, our right hands raised side by side from our wheelchairs.

Under the clerk’s watchful eyes, we signed our full legal names inside the signature boxes on our DS-11 forms, wrote out the checks for the Department of State application fee and the Postal Service execution and photo fees, and watched her seal our applications and our certified birth certificates inside two tamper-evident transmittal pouches bound for the National Passport Center.

Ten Weeks Later (Saturday, June 30, 2007) — Two Crisp Blue Books in the Mailbox

Because the spring and summer of 2007 saw the largest nationwide passport backlog in modern history—triggered by new federal rules requiring passports for air travel across the Western Hemisphere—the routine six-week wait stretched into ten full weeks.

Every afternoon when the mail carrier walked up Arvin Road, I rolled out onto the front porch ramp to check the mailbox beside our front door.

Then, on Saturday afternoon, June 30, 2007, I opened the metal mailbox lid and pulled out four stiff envelopes from the United States Department of State: two flat manila envelopes returning our original raised-seal Virginia birth certificates, and two Priority Mail envelopes with stiff cardboard inserts inside.

“Katie!” I called out, wheeling straight down the hallway into our dual-desk office and holding up the four envelopes. “They’re here!”

Katie spun her SwiftChair away from her keyboard so fast her front casters chirped against the floor mat. Side by side, we tore open the tear-strips on the two Priority Mail envelopes and slid out two brand-new, dark navy-blue United States Passports, the gold Great Seal of the United States and the new biometric electronic-chip symbol gleaming across the textured front covers.

Opening the inside covers, we stared down at our digitized two-by-two post-office portraits printed beneath the holographic eagles, valid for ten full years until June 2017.

“Look at that, Nate,” Katie smiled, setting our two open passports on the desk blotter before flipping up her inner armrest and leaning right into my arms for a long, tight, deep-pressure hug. Pressing my cheek against her hair as we held each other close—feeling that unmistakable calm and security that always washed over both of us whenever we cuddled together—I listened to her whisper against my shoulder: “Our own house on Arvin Road, our own software LLC, our horizontal Virginia State IDs, and now two United States Passports. Wherever the rails go next, we have our tickets.”

Associate Degrees in Hand, ‘Not the Right Skill Match,’ & Launching Prairie Twin Interactive From Arvin Road

Associate Degrees in Hand, ‘Not the Right Skill Match,’ & Putting Our Virginia LLC to Work

Date: 2007-06-14 at 14:15 America/New_York

Thursday, June 14, 2007, 2:15 PM — “Not Quite the Right Skill Match” & The Careful Language of Corporate HR

“Your PHP database queries and your Associate of Applied Science transcripts from the Community College of Hampton Roads are certainly impressive on paper,” the human-resources director said in a smooth, carefully measured voice at two-fifteen on Thursday afternoon inside a second-floor office park off Virginia Beach Boulevard, folding her hands neatly atop our printed resumes without quite meeting our eyes. “However, after reviewing our current project pipeline this afternoon, we feel that your background isn’t quite the right skill match for what our team is looking for right now, and we are looking for candidates with a bit more traditional in-house agency experience.”

Sitting side by side in our black SwiftChairs across the glass conference table, Katie and I exchanged a single, quiet glance.

We didn’t need a translator to know what had actually changed between eleven o’clock that morning—when the company’s lead developer had practically begged us over the phone to come in as soon as possible after testing our live PHP and SQL transit-schedule database—and two-fifteen that afternoon.

At eleven o’clock on the telephone, we were two twenty-two-year-old software developers with accredited associate degrees from CCHR and clean, normalized SQL code. At two o’clock, when the elevator doors opened and Katie and I rolled into the reception lobby side by side in two motorized power wheelchairs after riding CVTA Route 15 and Route 20 to the office park, we watched the lead developer’s smile freeze on his face before he hurriedly called the human-resources director into the room.

It was our sixth traditional job interview across Virginia Beach and Norfolk since returning from our birthday week in Alexandria and finishing the final PHP and SQL modules with Tina, Sheila, and Jim in May.

We had done everything the traditional employment playbook told young adults to do. We had filled out the multi-page paper and online applications. We had brought our framed Associate of Applied Science degrees from the Community College of Hampton Roads—never once regretting that we had rolled out of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center after twelve days without an RRC certificate, because we knew an RRC piece of paper meant nothing in the real world next to an accredited college degree and live production code.

And in all six interviews, the exact same script had played out almost word for word.

No employer in 2007 was foolish enough to say out loud that they didn't want to hire two twenty-two-year-old twins in power wheelchairs who commuted by public bus. Every human-resources manager in Hampton Roads had been trained by corporate counsel on how to avoid running afoul of the Americans with Disabilities Act and Virginia's disability rights statutes. Their language was always impeccably polite, rehearsed, and legally bulletproof: not quite the right skill match, looking for a different blend of experience, decided to go in another direction.

Yet when a company posts an entry-level job asking for HTML, CSS, PHP, and SQL, raves about your live PHP database over the phone, and suddenly discovers ten minutes after seeing your wheelchairs that you "aren't the right skill match" while leaving the exact same job posting up on their website three weeks later, you don't have to be a lawyer to read between the lines.

"Thank you for your time this afternoon," Katie said politely, closing her leather portfolio binder and resting it across her lap as we turned our wheelchairs around, rolled out to the elevator, and headed back down to the bus stop on Virginia Beach Boulevard.

4:00 PM — Putting Prairie Twin Interactive, LLC to Work From Our Dual Desks on Arvin Road

When we rolled back up our aluminum porch ramp on Arvin Road at four o'clock, poured two tall glasses of cold ginger ale in the kitchen, and wheeled side by side into our twelve-by-twelve office bedroom, neither of us was defeated. If anything, watching six corporate HR departments hide behind polite boilerplate had burned away the last shred of doubt about what we needed to do.

"You know what the funniest part of that interview was, Nate?" Katie asked, parking her SwiftChair flush beside mine under our twelve-foot span of worktables and tapping the framed Virginia State Corporation Commission certificate hanging on the wall above our monitors—PRAIRIE TWIN INTERACTIVE, LLC. "That agency's own corporate website is still running broken table layouts from 1999 that don't even validate in a modern browser, and their contact form throws an unescaped SQL error if you type an apostrophe into your last name."

I burst out laughing, the tension of the afternoon evaporating in an instant. "And they told us we didn't have the right skill match!"

"We don't need a corporate HR department to give us permission to write code and earn our own spending money," Katie said firmly, her fingers lacing through mine across our wheelchair armrests. "We already have our associate degrees from CCHR. We already have two six-foot desks, high-speed internet, and our own Linux server right here in this room. And thanks to Dad and Mr. Vance, we already have Prairie Twin Interactive, LLC registered with the state and our Suite 214 commercial mailbox at The Parcel Center so we can sign client contracts and cash business checks without ever putting Arvin Road on an invoice."

"And when a small business owner in Virginia Beach, Norfolk, or Chesapeake hires Prairie Twin Interactive over email and phone to build their PHP website or normalize their inventory database," I grinned, opening a fresh directory on our server to build our commercial portfolio site, “the code doesn’t care that the two developers writing it are sitting side by side in power wheelchairs—or that we take our lunch breaks together in our own kitchen and sleep every night in our bedroom closet.”

By the end of July, we had landed our first three paid web-development contracts—building a custom PHP parts-catalog database for an independent marine-supply shop in Norfolk, redesigning the schedule and registration portal for a Tidewater community music school, and coding an automated invoice tracker for a regional printing company.

The Friday afternoon in August when we rolled into The Parcel Center, unlocked Box 214 with our brass key, and pulled out our very first three client checks made payable to Prairie Twin Interactive, LLC, Katie held the envelopes up in the sunlight with tears of pride shining in her blue eyes.

Dad was still faithfully covering every household bill on Arvin Road from Alexandria, just as he had promised. Now, however, as we deposited our own self-earned software revenue into our business and joint accounts, bought our own thirty-day CVTA bus passes, upgraded our video camera gear, and spent every evening analyzing regional transit budgets side by side at our dual desks, we weren’t just surviving anymore.

We were twenty-two-year-old business partners, unofficial homeowners, and best friends—and as 2007 turned toward the 2008 municipal election year across Hampton Roads, we were ready to take on City Hall.

Do Better: Ideas for CVTA & The Kempsville City Council

Do Better: Ideas for CVTA & The Four-Bus Mayoral Loop

Part 1: Does the Bus Run? Calling Out CVTA’s Complacency & The 2008 Regional Mayoral Challenge

Date: 2008-04-14 at 13:30 America/New_York

Thursday, April 14, 2008, 1:30 PM — The Binders at Eighteenth Street & The “Good Enough” Mentality

“Look at the open three-ring binder on the corner of the staff table, Nate,” Katie whispered, leaning slightly across her SwiftChair armrest toward mine as we parked our wheelchairs at the end of the front visitor row inside the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority boardroom on Eighteenth Street in Norfolk. “That’s our Tuesday post. They printed the whole thing out and highlighted the timetable chart in yellow.”

I followed my sister’s gaze across the polished laminate table where CVTA’s senior operations staff and the appointed city council commissioners from around Hampton Roads were shuffling their agenda packets before the monthly Transportation District Commission meeting gaveled in.

Sure enough, clipped inside the deputy planning director’s black binder—and photocopied into three separate packets along the commissioners’ dais—were six pages printed directly from Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit, complete with the coastal-navy header and the custom PHP route-comparison tables I had coded the week before at our dual desks in the brick ranch on Arvin Road off Indian River Road and Military Highway in Virginia Beach.

“Every weekday morning between eight and ten o’clock, our server logs show static IP blocks from this building and all six City Halls reading our PHP tables,” I whispered back to Katie, glancing down the row of commissioners. “They read every word we write, Katie. They just don’t know what to do with two twenty-two-year-old twins in power wheelchairs who won’t pat them on the back for the status quo.”

When the commission chair called the brief public-comment period at the start of the one-thirty afternoon meeting—scheduled, as always, in the middle of a Thursday workday when almost no working commuter could attend—Katie released her joystick brake and rolled smoothly up to the low microphone table at the front of the room, with me rolling right up beside her holding our printed schedule audit.

“Mr. Chairman, commissioners, and CVTA staff,” Katie said clearly, her voice steady and polite as every head along the horseshoe dais turned toward our two wheelchairs. “My brother Nathaniel and I are the authors of Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit. We ride CVTA buses in our power wheelchairs every week across Virginia Beach, Norfolk, Chesapeake, and the Peninsula, and we pay our regular thirty-day pass fares just like thousands of other citizens who depend on this network.”

Down at the staff table, the senior service planner and the communications director exchanged an immediate, tight-lipped glance, recognizing our names at once.

“Over the past two years,” Katie continued, resting her hand on the timetable charts across my lap, “we have documented why riders across Hampton Roads are being left behind—not because our region lacks the roads or the riders, but because this agency and our six member cities have settled for schedules that lock working people out. Look at your own printed Route 1 schedule between Downtown Norfolk and Pembroke East: on the Norfolk side of the line, from Downtown Norfolk through Wards Corner and Ocean View to the Amphibious Base, Route 1 runs every fifteen to thirty minutes and runs late into the night until 2:15 AM, seven days a week. The exact moment Route 1 crosses the city line into Virginia Beach toward Pleasure House Road, Haygood, and Pembroke East, most of the buses turn around at the border, service drops to once an hour, only runs during the day with the last bus leaving Pembroke East at 6:22 PM, and has no Sunday service at all. On Route 25 from Glenrock Mall to the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus, buses run every thirty minutes to Newtown Road at the city line, where half of them turn right back around into Norfolk, leaving the Virginia Beach side down Princess Anne Road to CCHR with hourly daytime-only service that ends at 5:53 PM. At the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus hub, the last Route 12 bus back toward Military Highway and Indian River Road leaves at 5:48 PM. If a citizen rides Route 33 to the Virginia Beach Municipal Center to attend a 6:00 PM City Council meeting and needs to catch Route 12, Route 25, or Route 29 at CCHR to get home, they have to leave City Hall at 5:33 PM—twenty-seven minutes before the council meeting even starts. Across the water, the last southbound Route 61 across the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel still leaves Newport News Transit Center at 6:45 PM, and riders transferring on multi-bus routes are still getting penalized with a second fare because the two-hour paper transfer expires while they wait for sixty-minute local buses."

"We aren't here to bash public transit," I added from my chair beside Katie. "We love public transit. We need public transit to live our lives. We're here because CVTA can be so much better than this—with timed evening transfer pulses at CCHR, Glenrock Mall, and Hilltop, service running until at least ten or eleven o'clock at night, clean transit center restrooms, and a modern smart-card fare system that doesn't punish two-bus commuters—if the leaders on this commission have the political willpower to fund and demand it."

The commission chair offered a polite, practiced nod as the three-minute timer beeped. "Thank you both for your comments. Staff will take your blog submissions under advisement."

Twenty minutes later, when the board recessed into the hallway outside the Eighteenth Street conference room, CVTA's senior service planner and one of the veteran municipal council commissioners walked past our wheelchairs near the water fountain. Stopping beside us with a folder tucked under his arm, the planner offered the tired, defensive half-smile of a bureaucrat who had spent fifteen years guarding an unchallenged routine.

"Look, Katie, Nate," the planner said, lowering his voice as the commissioner nodded beside him, "we read your blog every week. You two obviously put a lot of math into those PHP charts of yours. But you have to be realistic about how transit works in a region like Hampton Roads."

"Realistic about what?" Katie asked, looking straight up at him from her SwiftChair.

The commissioner shrugged his shoulders, palms turned upward in the exact gesture that summed up thirty years of regional transit policy.

"Does the bus run?" the commissioner asked rhetorically. "Yes, the bus runs. Every morning the garages roll the fleet out across all six cities. Do people get to CCHR and the malls and the shipyards during the day? Yes. Is it good enough for what our city councils budget every spring? I guess so. Nobody at City Hall is clamoring to spend millions more running buses late into the night or overhauling transfer rules when the buses are already out there running their routes."

Katie and I looked at each other as the planner and the commissioner patted the folder and walked back into the boardroom.

There it was, spoken right out loud in the hallway of Eighteenth Street: the entire institutional philosophy of the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority.

Does the bus run? Yes. Is it good enough? I guess so.

For decades, CVTA and the politicians who funded it had hidden behind that exact complacency. As long as a diesel bus rolled past a stop sign once an hour during banker's hours and the annual federal grant paperwork got signed, the agency and the six city councils treated the box as checked. Until Ideas for Coastal Virginia

Transit came along, nobody with the technical skills to dissect their Transportation Service Plans—and the daily lived reality of riding those buses in power wheelchairs—had ever stood up in public and told them to do better.

As we rolled our wheelchairs out the automatic glass doors of the Eighteenth Street headquarters toward the Granby Street bus stop to catch our ride home, Katie's jaw was set with quiet fire.

"Did you hear what that commissioner said, Nate?" Katie asked as we waited on the concrete sidewalk pad. "'Nobody at City Hall is clamoring to spend money or overhaul the routes because it's good enough.' He just admitted the truth. The problem isn't that CVTA can't be improved. Every single improvement we've written about on the blog is completely doable. The only thing missing is the political willpower from the mayors and city councils who control CVTA's purse strings and sit on that board."

"And half of those city halls are up for election this year," I said, the realization clicking into place as the low-floor CVTA bus pulled up to the curb and kneeled its front suspension.

"Every single one of them has elections in 2008," Katie said as the hydraulic ramp folded down onto the concrete and we rolled up into the front wheelchair securement bays. "And as soon as we get home to Kempsville, we are going to put their political willpower to the test in front of every voter in Hampton Roads."

Mapping the 2008 Regional Mayoral Elections & Issuing the Open Challenge

Back at our dual computer desks in the spare bedroom office of our new Kempsville house that evening, Katie and I pulled up the official 2008 Virginia State Board of Elections candidate filings across all six member cities of the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority: Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Norfolk, Hampton, and Newport News.

Sipping cold ginger ale from our glasses while my PHP editor and our browser tabs glowed side by side across our monitors, we mapped out the exact 2008 municipal calendar across the six cities.

"Look at how the 2008 mayoral calendar breaks down across the six CVTA cities," I said, pointing to the state election schedule on my screen. "Out of the six cities—Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Norfolk, Hampton, and Newport News—four of them are holding direct elections for Mayor here in 2008, while the other two are mid-term on their mayoral cycle."

Katie rolled her chair closer and read down the certified candidate lists with me.

"Norfolk and Newport News both elected their mayors to four-year terms back in May 2006, so neither Norfolk nor Newport News has a Mayor's race until May 2010—though both cities have City Council seats on the ballot next month on Tuesday, May 6, 2008," Katie noted. "Then, on that same Tuesday, May 6, 2008 spring municipal ballot, three CVTA cities are electing their Mayors: Chesapeake has an open-seat Mayor's race, Portsmouth has a contested Mayor's race, and Hampton has an open-seat Mayor's race across the water."

“And then our own city—Virginia Beach—moved its municipal elections to the fall general election ballot on Tuesday, November 4, 2008,” I said, scrolling down to the Virginia Beach filings. “And look at the Virginia Beach Mayor’s race: Mayor Myra Overton is running for another term after twenty years as Mayor, and she’s facing three challengers in a four-way race for Mayor of Virginia Beach, right alongside the at-large and district City Council races.”

Katie looked at Mayor Myra E. Overton’s name on the screen and shook her head thoughtfully.

Every lifelong resident of Virginia Beach knew the paradox of Mayor Myra Overton. On a personal level, she was a genuinely sweet, gracious, grandmotherly lady who had gotten her start in civic and political life serving on the city’s public library board and had championed the Central Library on Virginia Beach Boulevard for decades. If you met her at a ribbon-cutting or a neighborhood library reading, she couldn’t have been nicer.

As a municipal politician overseeing transportation for the largest city in Virginia, however, her twenty-year tenure had been a disaster for anyone who rode a bus. Among daily CVTA riders, bus operators, and local political watchers, there was a famous story that had circulated for years to explain why Virginia Beach’s bus service hours were so abysmal compared to Norfolk’s. There was no way to confirm she had ever actually said the words out loud, of course, but as the local legend went, if Mayor Overton had her way, the Route 20 bus on Virginia Beach Boulevard would depart Downtown Norfolk, roll east down the Boulevard to Newtown Road at the city line, and turn right back around and stay in Norfolk—to keep the riff-raff out, of course.

Whether that story was literal truth or courthouse folklore, one glance at the printed Route 1 and Route 25 timetables—where frequent, late-night Norfolk buses hit the Virginia Beach border and suddenly shriveled into once-an-hour daytime-only runs that vanished after dinnertime—made it painfully obvious why everyone in Hampton Roads believed it.

Katie leaned forward, resting her forearms on the desk.

“Four mayoral elections across Hampton Roads in 2008—Chesapeake, Portsmouth, and Hampton in May, and Virginia Beach in November—plus City Council races in all six CVTA cities,” Katie said. “Every single one of those candidates puts glossy photos on their campaign flyers claiming they care about regional transportation, traffic relief, working families, and citizens with disabilities. Let’s see how many of them are actually willing to step out from behind a podium and ride the bus with the two of us.”

Opening the PHP administrative dashboard for Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit, Katie and I drafted our landmark open letter together, carefully checking every word before publishing it to the top of the front page and sending personalized copies directly to the official campaign email addresses of every certified candidate for Mayor in Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Portsmouth, and Hampton—as well as the City Council candidates across all six CVTA cities:

> Thursday, April 14, 2008 — An Open Invitation to the 2008 Mayoral & City Council Candidates of Hampton Roads: Come Ride the Bus With Us
>
> Whenever we speak with staff and commissioners at the Coastal Virginia

> Transit Authority about late-evening bus curfews, ninety-minute routes, expired two-hour paper transfers, and missing sidewalk curb cuts, we hear the same unspoken excuse: Does the bus run? Yes. Is it good enough? I guess so.
>
> For the thousands of citizens across Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Norfolk, Hampton, and Newport News who rely on CVTA buses every single day to get to college, to work, to medical appointments, and to civic meetings —including wheelchair riders like the two of us—"good enough" is not good enough. CVTA can be improved into a first-class regional transit network, and the only ingredient missing is the political willpower of the elected mayors and city councils who fund and govern it.
>
> This year, voters in four of our six CVTA cities—Chesapeake, Portsmouth, and Hampton on May 6, and Virginia Beach on November 4—will elect their next Mayor, while voters across all six cities will elect members of their City Councils. Therefore, Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit is issuing a simple, non-partisan public invitation to every candidate for Mayor in Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Portsmouth, and Hampton, and every candidate for City Council across the region:
>
> Meet the two of us at a CVTA transit hub, leave your campaign car in the parking lot, pay the regular bus fare alongside us, and ride a real multi-bus loop on CVTA with two daily wheelchair riders. No staged press vans, no special charter buses, and no shortcuts—just the real schedules, the real transfers, and an honest conversation on camera about how we can give Hampton Roads the transit system our citizens deserve.

When I clicked Publish and dispatched the invitation emails across all four mayoral races and six cities, the comment section on Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit lit up within twenty minutes. Daily bus commuters from Ocean View to Kempsville, CCHR students, shipyard workers in Newport News and Portsmouth, and even readers who had followed us over from the Seattle Transit Blog cheered the challenge on and began forwarding the link to local newspaper reporters and campaign managers.

Then we waited to see which politicians actually had the courage to show up.

Silence Across the Region — And the One Candidate Who Said Yes

Days turned into weeks as the May 6, 2008 municipal elections in Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Hampton, Norfolk, and Newport News approached and passed.

Every morning, Katie and I sat side by side at our desks in Kempsville with our hot chocolate or cold ginger ale, checking our campaign inbox and phone messages.

From the mayoral campaigns in Chesapeake: silence. From the mayoral campaigns in Portsmouth: silence. From the mayoral campaigns in Hampton: a single three-sentence form email from a campaign aide thanking us for our "interest in regional infrastructure" and stating that the candidate's schedule did not permit a multi-hour bus ride, followed by silence. From the incumbent City Council members and establishment candidates across Norfolk, Newport News, Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Hampton, and Virginia Beach: not a single acceptance.

Even here in Virginia Beach, as the four-way November 2008 Mayor's race heated up through the summer, the twenty-year incumbent mayor's campaign ignored our invitation completely. The wealthy banking-executive frontrunner backed by the courthouse establishment didn't reply. The veteran budget-hawk former councilman didn't accept either. And every single incumbent and establishment candidate running for the Virginia Beach City Council pretended our email didn't exist.

"They really don't care, do they, Nate?" Katie said quietly one warm afternoon at our desks, staring at the spreadsheet on my monitor where almost every single row across Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Hampton, Norfolk, Newport News, and Virginia Beach still read No Response. "They want the title of Mayor or City Council member, and they want to sit on regional boards and cut ribbons on highway interchanges, but not one of them is willing to spend two and a half hours riding the bus system they fund."

Just as I reached for the mouse to update our public tracker post on the blog, my email client chimed with a new incoming message.

I blinked at the sender line on the screen, then clicked it open.

"Katie," I said, sitting forward in my SwiftChair. "Look at the inbox. Someone just replied."

Katie rolled her chair right up against mine and leaned in toward the monitor.

The email wasn't from a campaign press secretary or an automated mailing list. It came directly from the fourth candidate on the ballot for Mayor of the City of Virginia Beach—Scott Tanner, a young, thirty-something political-outsider Navy veteran who wasn't part of the entrenched City Hall establishment and didn't have the backing of the big beachfront real-estate donors.

His message was four sentences long:

> From: Scott Tanner for Mayor Campaign
> To: Katie & Nate — Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit
> Subject: Re: Open Invitation to 2008 Mayoral Candidates — Come Ride the Bus With Us
>
> Katie and Nate,
> I read your blog post and your route analyses, and you're right—nobody asking to lead the largest city in Virginia should be afraid to ride the bus system our citizens depend on every day. I accept your challenge. Tell me which transit hub in Virginia Beach to meet you at, what time to be there, and which buses we're riding, and I'll leave my car in the lot and ride the whole loop with the two of you.
> — Scott

Katie stared at the screen for three seconds, and then a slow, fierce grin broke across her face as she reached over and gripped my hand.

“Out of every mayoral candidate in Chesapeake, Portsmouth, Hampton, and Virginia Beach—and every City Council candidate across all six cities—only one person had the guts to say yes,” Katie said, her blue eyes shining with determination as she pulled the folded CVTA Virginia Beach route map across our desk. “And he’s running for Mayor right here in Virginia Beach. Come on, Nate—get your video camera batteries on the charger. We’re going to meet him at the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus bus loop, and we’re going to take him on the exact four-bus circuit across Virginia Beach and Norfolk: Route 29 to Hilltop, Route 20 to Glenrock Mall, Route 15 down Military Highway, and Route 12 right back to CCHR.”

Part 2: The Four-Bus Mayoral Loop, Silenced at Eighteenth Street, & Choosing to Run for the Kempsville Seat

Date: 2008-09-16 at 14:00 America/New_York

Tuesday, September 16, 2008, 2:00 PM — Four Buses Across Two Cities & The Expired Two-Hour Transfer “Right on time,” twenty-three-year-old Katie said, nodding toward the concrete island at the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus transit hub as mayoral candidate Scott Tanner locked his sedan in the student visitor lot and walked over to our two compact SwiftChairs with a notebook tucked under his arm.

“Katie, Nate—good to meet you both in person,” Scott said, shaking Katie’s hand and then mine while I checked the microphone levels on the compact digital camcorder mounted to my wheelchair lap tray. “I brought crisp single-dollar bills and quarters just like your email said. Where does our loop start?”

“Right here on Route 29 northbound to Hilltop,” Katie said, pointing up at the approaching forty-foot low-floor bus pulling into the CCHR bus loop. “We’re going to ride a single continuous four-bus circuit across Virginia Beach and Norfolk and bring you right back to your car at this exact bus stop: Route 29 from CCHR up to Hilltop, Route 20 westbound down Virginia Beach Boulevard into Norfolk to Glenrock Mall, Route 15 southbound down Military Highway back across the city line into Virginia Beach, and Route 12 back here to CCHR.”

When the front ramp of the Route 29 bus folded down onto the concrete pad, Katie and I rolled aboard into the dual front wheelchair securement bays and swiped our thirty-day CVTA magnetic passes through the farebox. Right behind us, Scott stepped up into the vestibule, fed his base fare plus the paper transfer fee into the bill validator, and took the timestamped paper transfer slip the driver tore off the cutter bar.

“Keep an eye on the punched time at the top of that paper transfer,” I told Scott as I framed the timestamped slip in my camcorder viewfinder while the bus pulled out of CCHR onto Princess Anne Road. “It’s good for exactly two hours.”

Because Virginia Beach’s local routes ran on forty-five- to sixty-minute headways without synchronized transfer pulses, the math of the two-hour paper transfer trap unfolded right in front of my camera lens in real time.

Our first leg on Route 29 carried us northeast up First Colonial Road to the Hilltop transfer stop, where we waited twenty-five minutes on an unsheltered concrete sidewalk pad in the September sun before boarding a westbound Route 20 bus down Virginia Beach Boulevard.

Halfway down the Boulevard past Little Neck and Newtown Road, an older Hispanic gentleman carrying a canvas tool bag boarded the bus and asked the operator a confused question in Spanish about which stop connected to the Military Highway corridor. Before the operator could shake his head, Scott leaned across the aisle and answered the rider fluently in Spanish—explaining the exact stop at Glenrock Mall where they could both transfer to Route 15.

“You speak Spanish?” Katie asked with genuine respect when the rider thanked Scott warmly and sat down two rows behind our wheelchairs.

“Picked it up during my Navy deployments to South America,” Scott said simply. “Half the folks riding Route 20 work in the hospitality kitchens at the Oceanfront or the construction yards along the Boulevard. A mayor ought to be able to talk to the people who keep the city running.”

When Route 20 dropped us off at the Glenrock Mall transit hub in Norfolk, we waited another twenty-eight minutes for our third bus—a southbound Route 15 heading down Military Highway toward Virginia Beach.

By the time the Route 15 bus rolled south along Military Highway and climbed the bridge over the Eastern Branch of the Elizabeth River to cross from Norfolk back into Virginia Beach, it was four-fifteen in the afternoon. Holding my camcorder steady on my lap tray with the river glinting through the bus window behind Katie and Scott, I recorded the conversation that became the centerpiece of our video.

“We’re crossing back into Virginia Beach right now, Scott,” Katie said on camera, holding up the official printed CVTA timetables for Route 33 and Route 12. “Let’s talk about what happens if a taxpaying citizen of Virginia Beach who relies on the bus—like Nate and me, or a working parent, or a senior citizen—wants to attend a formal evening meeting of the Virginia Beach City Council down at the Municipal Center in Courthouse.”

“Formal City Council meetings gavel in at six o’clock in the evening,” Scott said, looking down at the printed schedule columns in Katie’s hand.

“Six o’clock in the evening,” Katie repeated clearly. “Now look at the Route 33 schedule serving the Virginia Beach Municipal Center. You can ride Route 33 down to City Hall in the afternoon just fine. If you live at the north end of the Oceanfront, the last northbound Route 33 all the way to Sixty-Eighth Street leaves the Municipal Center at 6:01 PM—one minute after the council meeting starts—and the 7:01 PM trip terminates early at Nineteenth Street. And if you live anywhere else in Virginia Beach and need to ride Route 33 from the Municipal Center back to the CCHR hub to catch your connecting bus home—like Route 12, Route 25, or Route 29—look at the departure times.”

Katie tapped her finger against the bottom row of the Route 33 and Route 12 timetables so my camera lens could capture the exact numbers.

“The very last Route 33 out of the Municipal Center to CCHR leaves at 6:33 PM, and by the time it reaches CCHR, every single connecting route except Route 36 has already shut down for the night,” Katie said. “Because Nate and I live in Kempsville and ride Route 12 home from CCHR toward Military Highway and Indian River Road, look at when the last Route 12 bus of the entire day departs CCHR: 5:48 PM. To catch that 5:48 PM Route 12 home from CCHR, we have to leave City Hall on the 5:33 PM Route 33 bus—twenty-seven minutes before the six o’clock City Council meeting even starts! Our last bus home literally pulls out of CCHR twelve minutes before the Mayor bangs the gavel.”

Scott stared at the two printed timetables in disbelief, looking up into my camera lens. “So if you ride the bus to a six o’clock Virginia Beach City Council meeting to speak during public comment, you’re stranded at City Hall with no way home.”

“Every single Tuesday night,” I said from behind the camera. “You cannot tell citizens that local government is open to the public when City Hall’s own bus schedule locks bus riders and wheelchair users out thirty minutes before the meeting begins.”

Twenty minutes later, when we rolled down the front ramp off Route 15 at Indian River Road and boarded our fourth and final bus—eastbound Route 12 back to CCHR to complete our circle—the final piece of CVTA’s broken math played out right on cue.

Katie and I rolled up the ramp and swiped our thirty-day passes. Behind us, Scott handed his paper transfer slip to the Route 12 operator.

The operator glanced at the punched holes along the top edge of the paper slip and shook his head.

“Sorry, sir—this transfer expired nineteen minutes ago,” the driver said, tapping the two-hour rule printed on the farebox. “That’ll be another full dollar-fifty fare to ride back to the college.”

Right on camera, Scott had to reach into his pocket and feed a second full fare into the box just to finish a single afternoon round-trip back to his parked car at CCHR—solely because waiting for hourly buses had eaten up more than two hours.

Thursday, November 19, 2009, 1:35 PM — Cut Off at the Eighteenth Street Microphone & Blackballed From TRAC

That night in September 2008, I edited our four-bus ride down into a crisp twelve-minute documentary video with full burned-in open captions and published it at the top of Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit.

Within a week, the video had been watched more than forty thousand times across Hampton Roads and picked up by The Tidewater Pilot and every television station in Norfolk and Virginia Beach. In the November 2008 election, twenty-year incumbent Mayor Myra Overton was defeated, and although the wealthy banking-executive frontrunner edged out Scott Tanner in the four-way race, the public uproar over our video forced CVTA and City Hall to promise a “comprehensive review” of bus transfers and Virginia Beach evening service hours.

Fourteen months later, however, on a gray Thursday afternoon in November 2009 inside the CVTA boardroom on East Eighteenth Street in Norfolk, we learned exactly what CVTA's executive suite thought of that promise.

Katie and I had ridden three buses into Norfolk carrying a twenty-four-page PHP audit we had compiled over the autumn, documenting more than nine hundred missed transfer connections at Glenrock Mall and CCHR alongside a formal request for CVTA's raw General Transit Feed Specification schedule tables so riders could build real-time trip-planning tools. Just two weeks earlier, I had also submitted my formal application to fill one of Virginia Beach's vacant citizen seats on CVTA's Transit Riders Advisory Committee—known around the agency as TRAC.

Parked side by side in our SwiftChairs at the low public-comment table in the center of the boardroom, I was two minutes and forty seconds into reading our findings into the record while CVTA President and Chief Executive Officer Leonard Sterling and Chief Operating Officer Richard Halstead sat slouched in their high-backed leather chairs along the raised executive tier.

"—and because the outbound Route 20 and southbound Route 15 schedules at Glenrock Mall are offset by four minutes in the master dispatch table without a hold-for-transfer rule," I said clearly into the gooseneck microphone, holding up our printed PHP chart, "evening commuters transferring back into Virginia Beach are missing the final southbound bus seven nights a week—"

BZZZZT.

Before I could finish the sentence, Chief Operating Officer Richard Halstead reached forward and jabbed the master cutoff switch on the clerk's console. The red ring at the neck of my microphone went dead in the middle of my word.

"Your three minutes are expired, Mr. Prairie," CEO Leonard Sterling said flatly without looking up from his leather portfolio. "Next speaker."

"Mr. President, if staff would simply release the raw GTFS schedule files we requested under the Freedom of Information Act—" Katie spoke up from her SwiftChair beside me, her voice carrying across the quiet room even without the microphone.

"Public comment is not a question-and-answer session, Ms. Prairie," Sterling interrupted, waving a hand toward the rear doors. "The commission has a full agenda."

Fifteen minutes later, when the board recessed briefly before its closed executive session, Katie and I rolled our wheelchairs out into the tiled corridor near the drinking fountain to speak with Chief Operating Officer Richard Halstead and the agency's government-affairs director as they walked toward the coffee credenza.

"Mr. Halstead," I said politely, holding out the bound copy of our twenty-four-page schedule audit and a thumb drive containing our PHP transfer-timing script, "we brought a clean copy of the Glenrock Mall and CCHR connection data for your scheduling department, and I wanted to check on the status of my application for the Virginia Beach citizen seat on the Transit Riders Advisory Committee."

Halstead stopped, looked down his nose at the thumb drive in my hand, and didn't even reach out to take it. A thin, patronizing smirk curled the corner of his mouth.

“Look, Nate, Katie,” Halstead said, lowering his voice just enough that the reporters inside the boardroom couldn’t hear him, “let’s save everybody some time. My scheduling engineers don’t take operational direction from statistically insignificant hobbyist bloggers, and we aren’t handing over internal GTFS database files so the two of you can play armchair transit director from your living room.”

Katie’s blue eyes narrowed. “We ride your buses every single day of the week in power wheelchairs, Mr. Halstead. There is nothing ‘hobbyist’ about needing a bus that actually connects before dark.”

“And as for the Transit Riders Advisory Committee,” Halstead added smoothly, adjusting his silk tie as he turned back toward the executive suite door, “staff already forwarded our recommendations for the Virginia Beach TRAC vacancies this morning. Your name wasn’t on the list, Nate. TRAC is reserved for constructive community stakeholders—not blog agitators with a laptop.”

The heavy oak door of the executive suite clicked shut behind him.

For ten seconds, Katie and I sat side by side in the quiet hallway on East Eighteenth Street, staring at that closed oak door. They had cut off my microphone at a hundred and eighty seconds, laughed at our engineering work, locked up public schedule data paid for by the taxpayers, and secretly blackballed me from a volunteer citizen advisory committee because we had dared to prove on camera that their schedules were broken.

And the final insult came four months later, in the spring of 2010, when the eleven-member Virginia Beach City Council met down at the Municipal Center to vote on the city’s annual transit contribution. Rather than holding CVTA accountable or funding the evening connecting pulse we had proposed, ten-year Kempsville District incumbent Councilman Harold Dietz led the budget motion to strip out every dime of proposed late-evening bus funding—muttering into his dais microphone at the Tuesday afternoon work session that “almost nobody rides the bus out of Courthouse after dark anyway.”

Sitting side by side at our dual coding desks in our house off Military Highway and Indian River Road in Kempsville that evening watching the archived City Hall webcast over cold glasses of ginger ale, Katie reached forward and clicked Pause on the video player.

“Of course nobody rides the bus out of Courthouse after dark, Councilman Dietz,” Katie said to the monitor, her voice calm and razor-sharp. “There isn’t a bus out of Courthouse after 6:33 PM! That’s like taking the ramp off a building and claiming nobody in a wheelchair ever comes inside.”

Katie turned her SwiftChair toward me, her blue eyes steady and bright.

“Leonard Sterling and Richard Halstead think they can cut off your microphone at Eighteenth Street and blackball you from TRAC because we’re just two twenty-five-year-old bloggers in wheelchairs with no vote on their budget,” Katie said. “And Harold Dietz thinks he owns the Kempsville seat on the Virginia Beach City Council for life. Well, Harold Dietz’s seat is on the ballot this November, Nate. City Council elections in Virginia are non-partisan, and we live right here in our house in Kempsville. What do you say we stop asking Richard Halstead and Councilman Dietz for permission—and go take his seat on the City Council?”

“Let’s do it,” I said immediately, already opening a fresh PHP project directory on my MagnaBook Pro. “If they won’t let us sit at the public-comment table for three minutes, we’ll put you up on the dais where they have to answer to you.”

The Empty Podium on WHRC TV-15, The 94.1% Landslide, & Councilwoman Prairie

Part 1: The Empty Podium on WHRC TV-15, The 8:24 PM Three-Bus Sprint Home, & The Front-Page Metro Headline

Date: 2010-10-14 at 19:28 America/New_York

Thursday, October 14, 2010, 7:28 PM — The Empty Mahogany Podium Under the WHRC Studio Lights

“Two minutes to air, Ms. Prairie,” the WHRC TV-15 floor director called out quietly, holding up two fingers beside the center studio camera inside the public-television broadcast center on Hampton Boulevard in Norfolk. “Still no sign of Councilman Dietz or his campaign manager at the front desk, so per station rules, his podium stays lit and his microphone stays open.”

Parked in my compact SwiftChair just outside the edge of the key lights next to the producer’s monitor cart, I glanced across the blue-curtained television set toward my twenty-five-year-old twin sister.

Katie sat upright and composed in her black SwiftChair behind a low, wheelchair-accessible mahogany desk that the WHRC studio crew had set up on the left side of the stage, wearing a crisp royal-blue blazer over a cream blouse with a small brass lapel microphone clipped to her collar. Six feet to her right stood the second debate position: a tall, traditional standing mahogany podium bearing a white placard that read COUNCILMAN HAROLD DIETZ — KEMPSVILLE DISTRICT, bathed in a bright, unforgiving pool of overhead tungsten light and completely empty.

For five months, Katie and I had poured every ounce of our energy into the non-partisan Kempsville District race. We hadn’t hired a political consultant, we hadn’t taken a single check from Oceanfront hotel developers, and we hadn’t hosted cocktail receptions. Instead, I had built a custom PHP precinct-mapping and sidewalk-canvassing engine on our home server off Military Highway and Indian River Road in Kempsville, and we had spent the spring, summer, and early autumn campaigning directly from the front wheelchair securement bays of CVTA Routes 12, 15, 20, 25, and 29 and rolling down the neighborhood sidewalks of Kempsville, Bellamy Manor, Brandon, and Larkspur with Dad driving down from Alexandria every weekend to knock on front doors that had brick steps.

Through it all, ten-year incumbent Councilman Harold Dietz had treated our campaign as if we were invisible. When Coastal Virginia Public Media had sent out the formal certified invitations in September for tonight’s live forty-five-minute Kempsville City Council debate on WHRC TV-15—broadcast right from the edge of the Virginia Dominion University campus across all of Hampton Roads—Katie had returned her signed confirmation within twenty minutes. Councilman Dietz hadn’t even bothered to reply. Because he had neither accepted nor formally declined the invitation, WHRC's strict non-partisan broadcast rules required the studio to leave his standing podium on the stage and give the viewing public an unfiltered look at who had bothered to show up for the job.

"Ten seconds," the floor director whispered, lowering his arm toward the center camera lens. "Five, four, three…"

The red tally light atop Camera One glowed bright in the darkened studio.

"Good evening, and welcome to Coastal Virginia Public Media's live 2010 Decision coverage from our WHRC TV-15 studios on Hampton Boulevard in Norfolk," the veteran public-television moderator began in his resonant baritone. "Tonight we examine the race for the Kempsville District seat on the Virginia Beach City Council. Seated to my left is challenger Katie Prairie, a twenty-five-year-old Kempsville homeowner, software developer, and co-founder of the regional transit watchdog website Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit. To her right, as viewers at home can see, is the podium reserved for ten-year incumbent Councilman Harold Dietz. Although WHRC extended multiple invitations to Councilman Dietz's office over the past six weeks, our producers received neither an acceptance nor a decline, and his podium remains open should he arrive during tonight's broadcast. Because our non-profit public media rules require us to pose every scheduled municipal policy question to the stage, we will proceed with our full forty-five-minute forum. Ms. Prairie, the first question is yours."

Watching from beside the monitor cart with my MagnaBook Pro resting on my wheelchair lap tray, I felt a quiet surge of pride as the director punched up the wide two-shot on the studio monitors.

Every time the moderator asked a question about Kempsville stormwater drainage along Indian River Road, aging neighborhood sidewalks around Morrison Middle School and Northwood High School, small-business permitting, municipal transparency, or the city's annual transportation budget, the studio camera framed the stark visual contrast across every living room in Virginia Beach and Norfolk: on the left, a poised, razor-sharp twenty-five-year-old woman in a power wheelchair citing exact line items from the City of Virginia Beach's eight-hundred-page operating budget from memory without a single paper note on her desk; on the right, six feet of empty blue carpet and a vacant mahogany lectern where the ten-year incumbent hadn't cared enough to stand.

"Ms. Prairie, let's turn to regional transportation and your proposal for an Evening Civic Access Transit Pulse," the moderator said at the eight-minute mark before the end of the broadcast. "Critics on the current City Council have argued that extending CVTA bus service out of the Virginia Beach Municipal Center and the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus past six-thirty in the evening is an unnecessary taxpayer expense because ridership after dark is low. How do you respond?"

Katie looked straight into the glowing red camera lens.

"Saying nobody rides the bus out of the Virginia Beach Municipal Center after six-thirty at night when the last bus leaves at 6:33 PM is like taking the wheelchair ramp off City Hall and claiming nobody in a wheelchair ever comes inside," Katie said, her voice warm, clear, and unhurried. "Formal evening meetings of the Virginia Beach City Council gavel in at six o'clock. Yet if a working parent, a senior citizen, a college student, or a wheelchair user in Kempsville rides Route 33 down to City Hall and needs to connect to Route 12, Route 25, or Route 29 at the CCHR hub to get home, the very last Route 12 bus of the day leaves CCHR at 5:48 PM—meaning a citizen has to leave City Hall at 5:33 PM, twenty-seven minutes before the Council meeting even begins. For the cost of less than one-tenth of one percent of our city budget, we can run an evening bus pulse until ten-thirty at night so working people and citizens with disabilities are never locked out of their own local government again."

At 8:14 PM on the dot, the moderator thanked Katie, signed off to the viewers across Hampton Roads, and the red tally lights on the studio cameras clicked off.

And that was when the real moment of the campaign began.

Thursday, October 14, 2010, 8:14 PM — Crossing Six Lanes of Hampton Boulevard With Reporter Greg Mercer to Catch the 8:24 PM Route 2

The instant the studio floor director called "We're clear!" at 8:14 PM, Katie didn't linger on the stage to bask in the applause of the camera crew.

While the audio technician unclipped the brass lapel mic from her blazer, Katie glanced down at her wristwatch, released her joystick brake, and rolled swiftly down the studio ramp toward my wheelchair as I closed my MagnaBook Pro and slipped it into my padded canvas backpack.

"Eight-fourteen, Nate," Katie said quietly as our two SwiftChairs fell into formation heading for the heavy soundproof doors of Studio A. "We have ten minutes to make the crosswalk."

Out in the bright fluorescent lobby of the WHRC broadcast center, Tidewater Pilot Metro politics reporter Greg Mercer—a veteran city-hall journalist in a rumpled trench coat with a spiral reporter's notebook in one hand and a digital voice recorder in the other—stepped away from the reception counter and hurried straight toward us.

"Ms. Prairie! Katie!" Greg Mercer called out, clicking the record button on his handheld recorder. "Greg Mercer with The Tidewater Pilot. That empty podium on live television was something else. Do you have ten minutes to sit down here in the lobby and give me a quick post-debate interview for tomorrow morning's Metro section?"

Katie glanced at the round wall clock above the WHRC glass entrance doors—8:15 PM—and looked back up at Greg with a friendly, earnest smile.

"I'd be happy to answer every question you have, Mr. Mercer," Katie said as I hit the big silver ADA push-plate to swing the front lobby doors open into the crisp October night air, "as long as you don't mind walking fast across Hampton Boulevard with us right now."

Greg blinked in surprise, tucking his pen behind his ear as he stepped out onto the concrete sidewalk beside our two powerchairs. "Across Hampton Boulevard? Sure—did your campaign staff have to park your wheelchair van over in the university lot across the street?"

Katie and I exchanged a quick twin look as we set our SwiftChair speed dials to four miles per hour and rolled briskly down the WHRC front walk toward the signalized intersection at Forty-Ninth Street and Hampton Boulevard.

“We don’t have campaign staff, Mr. Mercer,” I said as Katie pressed the pedestrian crosswalk button at the curb, “and we don’t own a wheelchair van.”

Greg Mercer looked down at our two compact powerchairs, genuinely puzzled as six lanes of heavy port and university traffic rumbled past under the amber streetlights of Hampton Boulevard.

Wait—if the two of us didn’t have a fifty-thousand-dollar wheelchair-lift van waiting in the lot, and our dad David wasn’t down from Alexandria on a Thursday night, how on earth were two twenty-five-year-old twins in power wheelchairs getting all the way from the West Side of Norfolk back to Kempsville in Virginia Beach at eight-fifteen at night?

The white WALK silhouette flashed on across the six-lane boulevard.

“Come on, Mr. Mercer—this light only gives twenty-two seconds,” Katie said cheerfully.

Jogging two steps to keep pace with our electric motors as we rolled straight across all six lanes of Hampton Boulevard to the opposite sidewalk, Greg held his digital recorder out toward Katie. “Wait a second—where are we going if your car isn’t over here?”

Reaching the far curb cut on the southbound side of Hampton Boulevard, Katie and I braked our SwiftChairs side by side right beneath a blue-and-white metal sign bolted to a utility pole:

CVTA BUS STOP — ROUTE 2 (HAMPTON BLVD / DOWNTOWN NORFOLK).

Greg Mercer stopped dead in his tracks on the concrete sidewalk, his mouth slightly open as he looked up at the metal bus stop sign, then down at our two power wheelchairs, and then back up Hampton Boulevard where the twin headlights of an approaching forty-foot low-floor CVTA gill-window transit bus were cresting the rise three blocks north.

“You’re taking the city bus?” Greg asked, staring at us in disbelief. “From a live television debate on Hampton Boulevard back to Virginia Beach—at eight-twenty at night?”

“Not just one city bus, Mr. Mercer—three of them,” I said, checking the glowing digital readout on my watch: 8:22 PM. “And that’s why we couldn’t stay in the WHRC lobby for ten minutes.”

“Walk me through this before that bus gets here,” Greg said rapidly, holding his voice recorder right between Katie’s chair and mine while his other hand scribbled furiously across his spiral pad under the streetlight. “What happens if you miss that bus coming down the street right now?”

“Look at the timetable math,” Katie said calmly, pointing up Hampton Boulevard as the southbound CVTA Route 2 bus signaled toward the curb with its amber destination sign glowing 2 DOWNTOWN NORFOLK. “The WHRC debate ended at 8:14 PM. This bus pulling up right now is the 8:24 PM Route 2 southbound. We have to catch this exact 8:24 PM bus down Hampton Boulevard to the Downtown Norfolk Transit Center, which gets us into Downtown Norfolk just before nine o'clock."

With a loud hiss of compressed air, the forty-foot Route 2 bus braked at the curb beside us and kneeled its front suspension. The folding glass doors swung open, and the warning chime beeped as the steel hydraulic wheelchair ramp unfolded onto the sidewalk concrete.

"Once we get to Downtown Norfolk Transit Center just before nine," I continued as I rolled backward up the steel ramp first to pull into the rear-facing curbside securement bay, "we have fifteen minutes to transfer onto the 9:15 PM Route 20 bus heading eastbound out Virginia Beach Boulevard."

"And that 9:15 PM Route 20 bus gets us out to the Glenrock Mall transit hub at 9:45 PM," Katie added, pausing at the bottom of the wheelchair ramp and looking back over her shoulder at Greg Mercer standing under the streetlight with his notebook and recorder. "At 9:45 PM at Glenrock Mall, Nate and I have to transfer onto the very last Route 15 bus of the night going south down Military Highway across the city line into Virginia Beach. If we had stayed in the WHRC lobby talking for ten minutes and missed this 8:24 PM bus right here on Hampton Boulevard, we would miss the 9:15 PM Route 20 in Downtown Norfolk, we would miss the last Route 15 of the night at Glenrock Mall, and the two of us would be stranded in Norfolk overnight in our wheelchairs with no way home."

Greg Mercer stared at Katie, stunned silent for two full beats as the bus driver waited patiently at the controls.

"My God," Greg breathed, his pen hovering over his pad. "You just debated for forty-five minutes on live television next to an empty podium because the incumbent didn't bother to show up, and now you're sprinting to catch a three-bus transfer chain across two cities before the system shuts down for the night."

"Mr. Mercer," Katie said simply, her blue eyes steady under the streetlight before she guided her SwiftChair smoothly up the metal ramp into the bus vestibule beside me, "improving the CVTA bus system—specifically Virginia Beach's locally funded share of the regional system—is the entire reason I'm running for City Council. Have a good night, and thank you for walking us to the stop!"

As we swiped our thirty-day CVTA passes through the farebox and locked our wheelchair brakes in the dual front bays, the hydraulic ramp folded back inside, the glass doors hissed shut, and the 8:24 PM Route 2 bus pulled away down Hampton Boulevard—leaving the veteran Tidewater Pilot reporter standing on the curb under the bus stop sign, staring after our taillights and scribbling in his notebook as fast as his hand could move.

Friday, October 15, 2010, 9:30 AM — Section B1 Above the Fold & All Ten Lines Lit on WHRC 89.5 FM

We made our 9:15 PM Route 20 transfer in Downtown Norfolk with eleven minutes to spare, caught the final 9:45 PM southbound Route 15 at Glenrock Mall, and rolled through the front door of our house off Military Highway and Indian River Road in Kempsville at ten-forty that night—tired, happy, and ready for a late cup of hot chocolate before bed.

At nine-thirty the next morning, while Katie and I were sitting side by side at our dual coding desks drinking cold orange juice and checking our overnight campaign emails, we heard the familiar sound of Dad's key turning in the front deadbolt.

"Morning, kids!" Dad called out, walking into our home office carrying a steaming travel mug of black coffee in one hand and a thick bundle of five freshly printed Friday morning editions of The Tidewater Pilot under his other arm. "I took a personal day in Tysons and drove down early so we could canvass Bellamy Manor this afternoon—and I bought out the newsstand box at the corner convenience store on my way in. Have you two seen Section B yet?"

"Not the print edition," I said as Katie and I rolled our chairs back from our desks. "Did Greg Mercer's blurb run inside the Metro pages?"

Dad let out a laugh that crinkled the corners of his eyes behind his glasses, pulled the Metro & Virginia section from the top of the bundle, and laid Section B1 flat across our desk.

It wasn't a two-paragraph blurb buried on page four.

Stretching all the way across the top of the Friday Metro front page above the fold in bold seventy-two-point black type was a banner headline written by Greg Mercer:

AN EMPTY PODIUM—AND AN 8:24 P.M. BUS TO CATCH Incumbent Dietz Skips Televised WHRC Debate; Challenger Katie Prairie Commands the Hour—Then Races Across Hampton Boulevard in Her Wheelchair to Make Last Bus Connection Home to Virginia Beach

Directly beneath the headline sat two side-by-side color photographs spanning all six columns of the page. On the left was a crisp frame captured from the WHRC TV-15 broadcast showing twenty-five-year-old Katie seated at her accessible studio desk next to Councilman Harold Dietz's brightly lit, completely empty mahogany podium. On the right was a photograph taken by a Tidewater Pilot photographer Greg Mercer had reached by cell phone on Hampton Boulevard—showing Katie and me rolling our black SwiftChairs up the steel hydraulic ramp of the kneeling 8:24 PM CVTA Route 2 bus under the streetlights while regular night-shift commuters looked on from the windows.

Katie and I read down the twenty-eight-inch column together in amazed silence. Greg Mercer hadn't missed a single detail: he had printed the exact 8:14 PM debate sign-off, the twenty-two-second sprint across all six lanes of Hampton Boulevard, the minute-by-minute transfer math of the 8:24 PM Route 2 to the 9:15 PM Route 20 to the final 9:45 PM Route 15 at Glenrock Mall, and Katie's parting words from the bottom of the bus ramp right in the closing box quote.

“Look at the traffic counter on our campaign server, Katie,” I said, glancing up at my real-time PHP analytics monitor. “Our website hits just passed twelve thousand for the morning, and small online donations of ten and twenty-five dollars are coming in every thirty seconds from Kempsville, Bayside, and Norfolk.”

At twelve-oh-six that afternoon, while the three of us were eating turkey sandwiches at the kitchen table before heading out to canvass, I clicked open the live audio stream of Coastal Virginia Public Media’s non-profit public radio station, WHRC 89.5 FM, during its flagship Friday noon regional call-in program.

“Welcome back to Tidewater Forum on WHRC 89.5 FM, I’m Catherine Lindsey,” the host said over our desktop speakers. “Before we open the phone lines for our weekly Friday civic roundtable, I need to remind our listeners of the ground rules: as a non-profit 501(c)(3) public broadcasting organization, WHRC radio and television are strictly prohibited by federal law from endorsing or opposing any candidate for public office. However, judging by our studio switchboard over the last ten minutes, it appears half of Hampton Roads has read Greg Mercer’s front-page Metro column in this morning’s Tidewater Pilot about last night’s Kempsville City Council debate here in our building. All ten of our studio call-in lines are flashing right now. Let’s go first to Line One—Arthur in Kempsville, you’re on WHRC.”

“Thank you, Catherine,” an older gentleman’s voice came over the radio clearly. “I’ve lived off Kempsville Road for thirty-four years and I voted for Harold Dietz twice in the past. Last night I tuned in to Channel 15 to watch the debate, and I sat there for forty-five minutes looking at an empty wooden podium while that young lady in the wheelchair answered every single budget and drainage question like she’d been running the city for ten years. And then I open my paper over breakfast this morning and find out she and her twin brother had to hustle across six lanes of Hampton Boulevard in the dark just to catch three buses home before CVTA locked up for the night! You don’t have to endorse anybody on the radio—the voters in Kempsville can see for ourselves who’s actually working for a living.”

“Thank you, Arthur—let’s go to Line Two, Brenda calling from a cell phone near Glenrock Mall,” Catherine Lindsey said.

“Hi, I’m a respiratory therapist and I ride that exact Route 20 and Route 15 transfer at Glenrock Mall three nights a week,” the second caller said, her voice thick with emotion. “I’ve seen Katie and her brother Nate in their wheelchairs on the front of the bus for years taking notes and talking to riders, and I never realized she was running for City Council until I saw the photo of them rolling up the Route 2 ramp in the paper today. For ten years City Hall has acted like those of us who ride the bus after eight o’clock at night don’t exist. Everybody on my shift at the hospital is voting for Katie Prairie on November second!”

Line after line, for forty consecutive minutes without a single negative call, listeners from Kempsville, Bellamy Manor, Larkspur, College Park, and across Hampton Roads lit up all ten phone lines on WHRC 89.5 FM—until the host finally had to laugh on air and remind callers that the program had other regional news topics on its rundown.

Sitting at our Kempsville kitchen table with Dad grinning over his coffee mug and Katie holding my hand across our wheelchair armrests, we finished our sandwiches, loaded four hundred fresh palm cards into our canvas side-bags, and rolled out into the crisp October sunshine for the final eighteen days of sidewalk canvassing before Election Day.

Part 2: The WTGA 790 AM Disability Attack, The 94.1% Landslide, & The Eighteenth Street Reckoning

Date: 2010-10-28 at 08:15 America/New_York

Thursday, October 28, 2010, 8:15 AM — Five Days Before the Election: The Incumbent Attacks Katie's Wheelchair on WTGA 790 AM

"Turn the desktop speakers up a notch, Nate," twenty-five-year-old Katie said from her SwiftChair beside mine on the Thursday morning before the election, pausing her typing on our morning canvassing walk-sheets as the live web stream of conservative talk radio WTGA 790 AM—Tidewater Talk 790—crackled across our home office off Military Highway in Kempsville. "The host just said Harold Dietz called in unscheduled."

I reached over and turned up the volume knob beside my monitor while taking a sip of cold chocolate milk.

For the past thirteen days since Greg Mercer's front-page Metro story in The Tidewater Pilot and the forty-minute switchboard takeover on WHRC 89.5 FM, Councilman Harold Dietz had vanished from public view—canceling two neighborhood civic-league appearances while our volunteer canvassing teams knocked on thousands of doors across Kempsville, Bellamy Manor, Brandon, and Larkspur. Now, with five days left before Tuesday's election, the ten-year incumbent had evidently decided to go live on Hampton Roads' loudest morning talk-radio microphone to try to stop the bleeding.

"We're joined on the studio line right now by Virginia Beach City Councilman Harold Dietz, representing the Kempsville District," the WTGA morning host announced. "Councilman, folks all over the city have been talking about that empty podium over at WHRC and the front-page story in the Tidewater Pilot about your twenty-five-year-old opponent catching three buses home at eight-twenty at night. Looks like you've got a real horse race on your hands out in Kempsville."

When Harold Dietz's voice came through the broadcast compressor, he didn't sound like a calm ten-year incumbent. He sounded tight, defensive, and rattled.

"Well, Mike, let's call that newspaper story what it was—a staged piece of political theater," Dietz snapped over the airwaves. "The Tidewater Pilot loves a melodramatic human-interest angle, so they print a picture of my opponent rolling onto a bus at night as if riding a bus qualifies somebody to manage a one-point-seven-billion-dollar municipal corporation. Let's talk about the real world at City Hall that nobody at the newspaper wants to mention."

Katie and I looked at each other across our wheelchair armrests, our fingers stilling on our keyboards.

“First of all,” Dietz ploughed ahead, his voice rising with irritation as he went completely off script, “if my opponent were actually elected on Tuesday, do the taxpayers of Virginia Beach have any idea what City Hall facilities would have to do to the historic mahogany City Council chamber in Building One? They would have to tear out the woodwork on the side of the raised Council dais and spend tens of thousands of taxpayer dollars building a custom structural wheelchair ramp just to get one person up to a desk! And second, let’s be honest with the voters about the demands of this job. Serving on the Virginia Beach City Council isn’t a hobby you do from a laptop. We sit in six-hour afternoon budget workshops followed by six-hour evening sessions that run past midnight, plus regional commission meetings all over Tidewater. Are we really supposed to pretend that a twenty-five-year-old girl in a wheelchair—who has to have her twin brother rolling right beside her everywhere she goes just to get through the day—has the physical stamina to handle twelve-hour days on the City Council?”

Inside our quiet home office in Kempsville, the silence lasted three full seconds.

Even over the radio broadcast, you could hear the WTGA morning host draw in a sharp, audible breath inside the Norfolk studio as he realized the incumbent councilman had just committed political suicide on live air in the largest military and veteran community on the East Coast.

“Uh—Councilman Dietz,” the WTGA host cut in quickly, his tone dropping an octave as the red warning lights on his studio call screener’s board began flashing like a Christmas tree, “hang on a second there, Harold. We have eighty thousand disabled veterans and wounded warriors living right here in Virginia Beach and Norfolk who use wheelchairs every day, and federal law under the Americans with Disabilities Act requires public buildings to be accessible anyway—”

“I’m just saying the voters deserve to know the practical reality and the cost, Mike!” Dietz insisted defensively before the host hastily took the program to a commercial break—and when the show came back from the break three minutes later, Councilman Dietz was no longer on the line.

What followed over the next forty-five minutes on WTGA 790 AM was unlike anything we had ever heard on conservative talk radio.

The host didn’t take a single call defending Harold Dietz—because there weren’t any. Instead, caller after caller was a furious Navy chief, a retired Marine colonel, a wounded Iraq or Afghanistan veteran from Little Creek or Naval Air Station Oceana, or a lifelong conservative Kempsville homeowner calling in to blister the incumbent for attacking a candidate’s wheelchair and mocking the bond between twin siblings who had lived with a spinal-cord condition since high school.

“Mike, this is Senior Chief Petty Officer Miller calling from Bellamy Manor,” a booming voice growled on Line One. “I served twenty-four years in the Navy and I’ve voted Republican in every election for the last thirty years. My nephew lost the use of his legs in Anbar Province in 2007 and uses a power wheelchair just like Katie and Nate Prairie. For a sitting Virginia Beach City Councilman to go on the radio and complain about the cost of putting a wheelchair ramp on the City Council dais—and to insult a young woman’s stamina because she uses a wheelchair and works alongside her twin brother—is the most disgraceful thing I’ve ever heard in this city. I walked out to my front yard five minutes ago, pulled Harold Dietz’s sign out of my grass, and threw it in the trash can!”

By noon on Friday, the fallout had turned into an avalanche. Three of Virginia Beach's largest business associations issued public statements revoking their endorsements of Councilman Dietz and clarifying that they stood for equal access for all citizens. When The Tidewater Pilot called our campaign phone asking for Katie's response to Dietz's radio remarks, Katie gave Greg Mercer a single, quiet two-sentence statement:

"My brother Nate and I have used power wheelchairs since our legs gave out during our junior year at Northwood High School, and we have never once asked anyone in Virginia Beach for pity. All we have ever asked for is a ramp to the table and a bus that runs late enough for working people to get home."

On Saturday morning, October 30—seventy-two hours before the polls opened—The Tidewater Pilot devoted the entire top half of its Editorial & Opinion page to a special full-width spread of reader letters under the banner headline:

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR: DIETZ'S ATTACKS ON BUSES, WHEELCHAIR RAMPS CROSS THE LINE

Sitting at our kitchen table with Dad over Saturday morning pancakes and orange juice, I read three of the printed letters aloud while Katie listened beside me:

> A Ramp to the People's Dais Is Not a "Special Favor"
> As a retired Navy Master Chief who lost both legs above the knee to an IED outside Fallujah in 2006, I nearly drove my hand-control truck off Kempsville Road on Thursday morning listening to Councilman Harold Dietz complain on WTGA 790 AM about the cost of building a wheelchair ramp up to the City Council dais for Katie Prairie. When I came home from Bethesda Naval Hospital in a wheelchair, nobody told me I lacked the "stamina" to contribute to my community. If the mahogany dais in Building 1 doesn't have a wheelchair ramp after twenty years of the Americans with Disabilities Act, that isn't an indictment of Katie Prairie—it is an indictment of Harold Dietz and every politician who never thought a citizen in a wheelchair belonged up there.
> — Master Chief Robert H. Callahan, USN (Ret.), Kempsville, Virginia Beach

> The 8:24 PM Bus Is Real Life, Not "Political Theater"
> Councilman Dietz claims Katie and Nate Prairie catching the 8:24 PM Route 2 bus home from the WHRC debate was a "publicity stunt." Tell that to those of us who close the retail stores at Pembroke Mall and Glenrock Mall every night and pray our connecting Route 20 or Route 15 bus isn't five minutes late so we aren't stranded in the dark. Katie and Nate Prairie have ridden the bus with us in the rain and cold for five years. On Tuesday, the bus riders of Virginia Beach are going to send one of our own to City Hall.
> — Denise T. Holloway, College Park, Virginia Beach

> We Remember the Day Their Legs Gave Out at Northwood High
> Hearing Councilman Dietz mock Katie Prairie for having her twin brother Nate rolling beside her broke my heart and made my blood boil. I taught English at Northwood High School in September 2001 on the Friday afternoon when sixteen-year-old Katie and Nate's legs gave out within three hours of each other. Every teacher in that building watched those two teenagers refuse to give up, finish high school from hospital beds and wheelchairs, earn their degrees at CCHR, build their own software business, > and make their home right here in Kempsville. Their bond isn't a weakness—it is the finest example of family courage in Virginia Beach.

> — Margaret L. Sterling, Retired Teacher, Bayside, Virginia Beach

When I finished reading Mrs. Sterling's letter, Dad had to take off his glasses and wipe his eyes with his napkin, while Katie held my hand tightly across our armrests.

Tuesday, November 2, 2010, 7:19 PM — The 94.1% to 5.9% Landslide & The Four-Station Election Night Post-Mortem

At seven o'clock on the evening of Tuesday, November 2, 2010, the polls closed across the City of Virginia Beach.

We hadn't rented a hotel ballroom at the Oceanfront. Instead, Katie, Dad, and I were gathered inside our living room off Military Highway and Indian River Road in Kempsville along with sixteen of our volunteer sidewalk canvassers, CCHR students, and fellow CVTA bus riders, with platters of warm pizza and two-liter bottles of ginger ale, orange soda, and flavored water set out on the dining table and a fresh pot of black coffee brewing in the kitchen for Dad. Across the living room wall, I had connected four television monitors and my dual laptop screens to our custom PHP precinct-return engine, which scraped the live precinct-by-precinct XML data feed straight from the Virginia State Board of Elections and the Virginia Beach Voter Registrar every fifteen seconds.

At 7:08 PM, the first four Kempsville precincts reported their optical-scan tabulator tapes.

Dad leaned over my shoulder, staring at my PHP dashboard screen through his glasses. "Nate… check your parser code on Kempsville Precinct Three and Bellamy Precinct One. Is a decimal point shifted?"

"The parser checksums match the state XML feed to the single vote, Dad," I breathed, my heart hammering against my ribs as five more precincts popped onto the screen in bright green. "Look at the raw totals."

At 7:19 PM—just nineteen minutes after the polls closed—all four local television network affiliates in Hampton Roads (WCVB-TV 10 Coastal News 10, WTID-TV 3 NewsChannel 3, WVHR-TV 13 13News, and WHRC TV-15) flashed simultaneous breaking-news graphics across the bottom of their screens with a loud electronic chime:

PROJECTION — VIRGINIA BEACH CITY COUNCIL (KEMPSVILLE DISTRICT): KATIE PRAIRIE (WINNER) — 94.1% HAROLD DIETZ (INCUMBENT) — 5.9%

Inside our living room in Kempsville, a roar went up that shook the framed blue butterfly print on the hallway wall. Dad wrapped both of his arms around Katie's shoulders and mine at the same time, his voice choked with pride, while Katie pressed her forehead against mine across our armrests with tears of pure joy shining in her blue eyes.

As the final precincts locked in over the next twenty minutes confirming the staggering 94.1% to 5.9% margin—the largest landslide defeat of a sitting incumbent in the modern history of Hampton Roads municipal politics—we unmuted the four television feeds and the radio stream to hear the stunned political analysts dissect what had just happened.

On WCVB-TV 10, Coastal News 10 anchor Don Roberts turned to Virginia Dominion University political science professor Dr. Quentin Marsh standing in front of the electronic precinct map.

"Ninety-four point one percent to five point nine percent, Dr. Marsh," the anchor said, shaking his head at the big board. "We have never seen numbers like this in a contested Virginia Beach City Council race. How does a ten-year incumbent get wiped out by eighty-eight points?"

"Don, what we just witnessed tonight in Kempsville is the textbook anatomy of a catastrophic one-two political knockout," Dr. Marsh explained, tapping the touchscreen map of Virginia Beach. "Three weeks ago, before the WHRC debate, Harold Dietz was sitting on a comfortable eight-point incumbent lead mostly because voters didn't know who Katie Prairie was. Then came Punch Number One on October fourteenth: Dietz didn't even bother to RSVP to WHRC TV-15, leaving his podium empty on live television for forty-five minutes while Katie Prairie demonstrated complete command of the municipal budget—followed ten minutes later by Greg Mercer's front-page story in the Tidewater Pilot showing Katie and her twin brother Nate sprinting across six lanes of Hampton Boulevard in their wheelchairs to catch the 8:24 PM Route 2 bus so they wouldn't miss the last three-bus transfer chain home to Virginia Beach. We now know from campaign insiders that by the Monday after that story ran, Dietz's internal tracking poll had crashed from an eight-point lead down to a dead heat—48.2 percent to 47.8 percent, a razor-thin four-tenths of one percent margin right inside Virginia's automatic recount threshold—and his major Oceanfront donors threatened to freeze his final forty-thousand-dollar TV buy."

Across the room on WVHR-TV 13, a live 13News remote camera panned across a cavernous, completely deserted ballroom at an Oceanfront resort hotel where untouched trays of shrimp cocktail sat under heat lamps beside a silent podium banner reading RE-ELECT COUNCILMAN DIETZ.

"And that panic inside the Dietz camp led directly to Punch Number Two last Thursday morning on WTGA 790 AM," the WVHR-TV 13 political reporter told the studio anchors from the empty ballroom. "Trying to look tough for his panicked donors, Councilman Dietz went on live talk radio, mocked the Prairies' three-bus ride home, complained about the taxpayer cost of building a wheelchair ramp up to the City Council dais in Building 1, and questioned whether a woman in a wheelchair rolling alongside her twin brother had the stamina to serve on Council. In a city filled with military families, disabled veterans, and working bus commuters, that radio call turned a 0.4 percent race into a 94 percent wipeout. The Councilman called Ms. Prairie three minutes ago to concede and left the hotel through a side kitchen door."

Meanwhile, on WTID-TV 3 NewsChannel 3, the tech-desk correspondent pulled up a live graphic highlighting our grassroots ground game:

"Don't overlook the engineering behind this victory, either," the WTID-TV 3 analyst noted. "Katie and Nathaniel Prairie didn't spend a dime on outside political consultants. Nathaniel Prairie wrote their custom PHP voter-turnout and precinct-mapping software himself, and look at the precinct turnout bars along the CVTA Route 12, Route 15, Route 20, and Route 36 corridors—precincts that normally see 18 percent turnout in an off-year municipal election surged by 42 percent tonight because bus riders and working families came out in droves to vote for one of their own."

Even over on conservative talk radio WTGA 790 AM, the evening election host sighed into his microphone as the 94.1% total scrolled across his screen: "Folks, Harold Dietz dug his own grave right here on our morning airwaves last Thursday. When a twenty-five-year-old woman and her twin brother out-work you, out-debate you, ride three city buses home in the dark, and build their own software from scratch, attacking their wheelchairs in a Navy town is a guaranteed way to get sent into retirement."

January to May 2011 — The Building 1 Dais Ramp, Locking $810,000 of CVTA Perks in Escrow, & Taking Seat on the CVTA Commission

During the eight weeks between Election Night in November 2010 and Reorganization Night in January 2011, municipal carpenters and accessibility contractors went to work inside the City Council Chamber of Building 1 at the Virginia Beach Municipal Center.

Removing the steep wooden steps on the right wing of the curved mahogany City Council dais, the city constructed a permanent, gently sloped, red-carpeted wheelchair ramp bordered by polished mahogany handrails leading straight up to the Kempsville District desk, where the heavy leather swivel chair was rolled away so twenty-five-year-old Councilwoman-Elect Katie Prairie could pull her compact black SwiftChair directly up to the voting console.

On Tuesday evening, January 4, 2011, with the chamber gallery packed wall-to-wall with Kempsville neighbors, CCHR students, bus operators, and retired Master Chief Robert Callahan sitting in the front row in his own wheelchair, Katie rolled up the new mahogany dais ramp to her Kempsville District seat, inviting Dad and me onto the dais beside her solely for the ceremonial swearing-in while I held open our bound leather copy of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Neither Katie nor I believed in any religion or any god—and before the ceremony, Katie had politely notified the Clerk of the Circuit Court that under Article VI, Clause 3 of the United States Constitution, Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of Virginia, and Section 49-9 of the Code of Virginia, she would be taking the secular constitutional affirmation on the Virginia Constitution rather than a religious oath on a Bible, omitting the optional parenthetical reference to a deity at the end.

Placing her left hand flat on the Virginia Constitution and raising her right hand, Katie repeated the constitutional affirmation of office as the newly elected Kempsville District Councilwoman in a clear, ringing voice that echoed to the back of the chamber:

“I do solemnly affirm that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent upon me as a member of the Council of the City of Virginia Beach, according to the best of my ability.”

As soon as the applause thundered across the chamber, Dad and I descended the ramp back to the front row of the public gallery so Councilwoman Katie Prairie could take her official seat alone at the Kempsville console on the dais.

She didn’t wait six months to keep the promise she had made to Greg Mercer at the 8:24 PM bus stop on Hampton Boulevard.

Just two weeks later, on Tuesday evening, January 18, 2011, Item 9B came up on the formal Virginia Beach City Council agenda: a request from the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority for a $1.42 million mid-year supplemental municipal appropriation to cover administrative cost overruns at CVTA’s Norfolk headquarters.

Stepping up to the low citizen and staff microphone podium on the chamber floor below the raised mahogany dais were two men in tailored charcoal suits whom Katie and I knew very well: CVTA President and Chief Executive Officer Leonard Sterling, and Chief Operating Officer Richard Halstead—the exact two executives who, fourteen months earlier on East Eighteenth Street, had cut off my public-comment microphone at the hundred-and-eighty-second buzzer, sneered in the hallway that we were “statistically insignificant hobbyist bloggers,” refused to release raw GTFS schedule files, and secretly blackballed me from the Transit Riders Advisory Committee.

Now, the roles were reversed. Sterling and Halstead were standing down at the floor microphone looking up at the raised mahogany dais—where twenty-five-year-old Councilwoman Katie Prairie sat in the elected seat of power looking down at them with her finger resting beside her microphone button, while I sat as a private citizen down in the front accessible bay of the chamber floor right beside the dais ramp with the PHP line-item audit I had prepared for her open on my MagnaBook Pro.

When CEO Sterling finished his five-minute presentation asking the City Council to approve the $1.42 million check with no strings attached, the Mayor turned toward the right wing of the dais.

“Councilwoman Prairie,” the Mayor said, “you have the floor.”

Katie pressed her white microphone button. The green indicator ring lit up—and this time, Richard Halstead didn’t have a cutoff switch.

“Thank you, Mr. Mayor,” Katie said, her voice calm, polite, and surgical as every camera in Building 1 zoomed in on her desk. “Mr. Sterling, Mr. Halstead, before the voters of Kempsville elected me to this Council by a margin of ninety-four point one percent, the two of you cut off my brother Nate’s microphone at Eighteenth Street and told us in the hallway that CVTA doesn’t take operational direction from ‘hobbyist bloggers.’ Now that you are asking the taxpayers of Virginia Beach for an extra one point four two million dollars, my brother and I have gone through every single line of your general ledger.”

Down at the podium, Richard Halstead swallowed hard, a bead of sweat glistening at his temple under the television lights.

“Out of the one point four two million dollars you are requesting tonight,” Katie continued, reading directly from the PHP audit sheet on her desk, “six hundred and ten thousand dollars goes toward fuel and frontline bus operator wages, which I fully support. The remaining eight hundred and ten thousand dollars, however, is earmarked for executive retention bonuses, out-of-state conference travel, fleet take-home sedans for senior staff, and proprietary scheduling consultant contracts. Meanwhile, here in Virginia Beach, the last Route 12 bus out of the CCHR hub still leaves at 5:48 PM, locking citizens out of our 6:00 PM Council meetings, and your agency still refuses to publish its raw General Transit Feed Specification database tables for the public.”

Katie held up a two-page printed budget amendment she had drafted with the City Attorney that morning from our audit notes.

“Therefore, Mr. Mayor,” Katie announced, “I move an amendment to Item 9B: the City of Virginia Beach will release the six hundred and ten thousand dollars for bus operators and fuel tonight, and we will lock the remaining eight hundred and ten thousand dollars of executive overhead in a restricted municipal escrow account. Not one penny of that eight hundred and ten thousand dollars will be released by the City Treasurer until CVTA meets two mandatory conditions: first, publishing its complete, unredacted GTFS schedule database online under an open public license within thirty days; and second, implementing the Evening Civic Access Transit Pulse—extending Route 33 out of the Virginia Beach Municipal Center until 10:30 PM on Council nights and operating a synchronized 9:00 PM and 10:00 PM evening connecting pulse for Routes 12, 25, 29, and 36 at the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus hub.”

“Second!” called out At-Large Councilman Ronald Villa from the other side of the dais with a broad grin.

When the electronic voting board on the chamber wall chimed ten seconds later, all eleven lights glowed green: 11–0.

And the reckoning wasn’t quite finished. Immediately after the budget vote, the Mayor called up Item 9C—the resolution appointing Virginia Beach’s new municipal representatives to the governing board of the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority, the Transportation District Commission, to fill the seat vacated by former Councilman Harold Dietz.

By a second unanimous 11–0 vote, the Virginia Beach City Council appointed Councilwoman Katie Prairie as a voting Commissioner of the Coastal Virginia Transit Authority.

Nine days later, on the fourth Thursday of January 2011, while every other city council commissioner from across Hampton Roads drove into Norfolk and parked in the reserved VIP lot behind CVTA headquarters on East Eighteenth Street, CVTA’s newest governing Commissioner arrived the exact same way she and I had always traveled: by riding a three-bus chain on CVTA—boarding Route 15 northbound on Military Highway, transferring to Route 20 westbound at Glenrock Mall into Downtown Norfolk, and riding Route 1 up Granby Street to Eighteenth Street while paying our regular fare.

When Katie and I rolled our SwiftChairs through the double doors of the Eighteenth Street boardroom, I parked at the front accessible citizen-advisor table while Commissioner Katie Prairie rolled straight up onto the raised Commissioners’ horseshoe dais—right past Chief Operating Officer Richard Halstead's chair. Under New Business, the very first official action Commissioner Katie Prairie took from the dais was exercising her unilateral prerogative as a Virginia Beach Commissioner to make a citizen appointment to the Transit Riders Advisory Committee.

"Pursuant to Section 4.2 of the Commission bylaws," Katie said clearly into her Commissioner's microphone while looking straight across the table at Richard Halstead, "as a voting Commissioner for the City of Virginia Beach, I hereby appoint Nathaniel Prairie to the Virginia Beach citizen seat on the Transit Riders Advisory Committee, effective immediately."

By May 2011, CVTA had published its complete open GTFS schedule feed and launched the permanent Evening Civic Access Transit Pulse across Virginia Beach. For the first time in the history of our city, any citizen who rode a public bus or used a wheelchair could attend a six o'clock City Council meeting, speak at the public microphone, and ride a CVTA bus safely home afterward.

Inside Building 1 at the Municipal Center, Katie also established a daily office habit that baffled the veteran city hall staffers down the corridor: whenever she was sitting at her desk and the main constituent telephone line rang, she didn't wait for a city clerk or a shared administrative receptionist to screen the call and take a paper message. In Katie's literal autistic mind, her name was on the door, the voters of Kempsville had hired her to do the job, and sitting three feet away from a ringing telephone without picking it up would be rude and dishonest. So whenever she could reach the receiver, she pressed the button herself and answered, "Councilwoman Katie Prairie's office, this is Katie speaking," so the caller knew she was actually at her desk working for them—regularly leaving Kempsville homeowners and retired shipyard workers speechless for two full seconds when they realized their own City Councilwoman had picked up the phone on the first ring.

And on every single Tuesday night when the Virginia Beach City Council adjourned at nine-thirty, Councilwoman Katie Prairie rolled down the mahogany dais ramp in Building 1 to meet me at the front of the gallery, and the two of us rolled out to the Municipal Center bus shelter alongside the citizens who had come to watch the meeting, swiped our thirty-day CVTA passes, and rode the 9:45 PM Route 33 and Route 12 pulse right back home to Kempsville.

The Gentlewoman from Virginia Beach: The House of Delegates

Stopped at the Third-Floor Gallery, Seated by Delegate Ronald Villa, & Winning the 85th District

Part 1: Stopped at the Third-Floor Gallery by Capitol Police, Seated on the House Floor Near Delegate Ronald Villa, & The Spark to Run

Date: 2012-02-09 at 11:35 America/New_York

Thursday, February 9, 2012, 11:35 AM — Stopped Outside the Third-Floor Public Viewing Gallery by Capitol Police

“The public viewing gallery for the House of Delegates should be right around this corner on the left, Nate,” twenty-six-year-old Katie said as the brass doors of the small historic passenger elevator slid open on the third floor of the Virginia State Capitol.

Side by side, we guided our compact SwiftChairs out of the narrow elevator cab onto the polished heart-pine floorboards of the third-floor balcony corridor.

It was a cold Thursday morning in February 2012, midway through the winter session of the Virginia General Assembly and thirteen months into Katie’s term representing the Kempsville District on the Virginia Beach City Council. Earlier that morning at nine o’clock, after riding up from Hampton Roads to testify both as a Virginia Beach City Councilwoman and as co-founder of Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit, Katie and I had presented our evening ridership numbers and bus-stop accessibility data to a House Transportation subcommittee down in the General Assembly Building—urging the state legislature not to slash the state transit operating funds that matched our new evening bus service in Virginia Beach. Since our afternoon train back home didn’t leave until four o’clock, we had rolled through the underground Capitol tunnel hoping to sit in the public viewing gallery and watch the full House of Delegates convene at noon.

Ahead of us, a line of schoolteachers, college students, and day-trippers was filing past the velvet rope into the steeply tiered wooden benches of the third-floor House Public Gallery.

Before our front casters reached the doorway, however, a uniformed Virginia Division of Capitol Police lieutenant standing beside the gallery entrance stepped gently into the center of the corridor and held up a gloved hand.

“Good morning, folks—hold up just a second for me,” the Capitol Police lieutenant said, his tone polite but firm as he looked down at our two power wheelchairs.

Katie and I braked our SwiftChairs together. “Good morning, Lieutenant,” Katie said calmly. “We already cleared the security screening downstairs at the visitor entrance. We’re just heading into the public viewing gallery to watch the noon House session.”

“Yes, ma’am, I see your visitor stickers,” the lieutenant replied, glancing toward the narrow gallery threshold and then back at our heavy powerchairs with genuine concern on his face. “I’m very sorry, folks, but we can’t bring wheelchairs into the third-floor public viewing gallery.”

My eyebrows drew together. “Is there not a level space at the top of the gallery aisle?”

“It’s not the floor space inside the doorway, sir—it’s emergency evacuation safety,” the Capitol Police lieutenant explained earnestly, gesturing back toward the small retrofit elevator we had just ridden up and the steep, winding eighteenth-century stairwell at the end of the hall. “Thomas Jefferson designed this building in 1788. If a fire alarm goes off or we have to order an emergency evacuation of the Capitol while the House is in session, that passenger elevator automatically locks out and recalls to the ground floor. From this third-floor gallery, the only way out of the building is down three flights of steep, narrow historic stairs. My officers have no safe way to carry power wheelchairs down three stories of stairs in an emergency, and I can’t put the two of you in a position where we couldn’t get you out of the building safely.”

Katie and I looked at each other across our armrests. Having spent more than ten years navigating every flavor of architectural barrier in Virginia, both of us could tell immediately that the Capitol Police officer wasn’t trying to brush us off—he was looking at a genuine life-safety trap in a two-hundred-year-old building and taking his duty seriously.

“So there’s nowhere in the State Capitol where a citizen in a wheelchair is allowed to watch their own House of Delegates vote?” Katie asked quietly, not angry at the officer, but with that familiar, steady look in her blue eyes whenever she ran into a systemic wall.

“I didn’t say that, ma’am,” the Capitol Police lieutenant said with a reassuring half-smile, reaching up to unclip the microphone of his shoulder radio. “Give me two minutes right here by the elevator. I’m going to walk downstairs and speak directly to the Sergeant-at-Arms and House Leadership to explain that we have a member of the public in a wheelchair and her companion upstairs who came to watch the House session, and that Capitol Police have emergency-egress safety concerns with the third-floor gallery. Let me see what Leadership can do.”

We parked our SwiftChairs beside the marble bust in the third-floor elevator vestibule and waited while the ten-minute warning bell for the noon floor session chimed overhead.

Four minutes later, the brass indicator needle above the third-floor elevator swung upward. The doors slid open, and the Capitol Police lieutenant stepped out alongside a tall gentleman in a dark three-piece suit wearing the silver badge of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Virginia House of Delegates.

“Councilwoman Prairie and Mr. Prairie?” the Sergeant-at-Arms asked warmly.

“Yes, sir,” I said.

“The Lieutenant just spoke with me and the Speaker’s office about the safety concern up here on the third floor,” the Sergeant-at-Arms said, holding out two heavy cream-colored cards stamped in gold leaf with the seal of the Commonwealth. “House Leadership does not want any Virginian turned away from watching the people’s House in session because of a wheelchair. By order of the Speaker, you and one ADA companion—or in your case, both of you together—have been granted a rare honor today. If you’ll ride the elevator down to the first floor with me, we’re going to seat you right on the Floor of the Virginia House of Delegates.”

Katie’s blue eyes widened slightly as she looked across at me, and we rolled our wheelchairs straight back into the elevator cab beside the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Thursday, February 9, 2012, 11:52 AM — Seated on the House Floor Near Virginia Beach Delegate Ronald Villa & The Spark

When the elevator doors opened on the first floor, the marble rotunda corridor outside the House Chamber was packed three-deep with corporate lobbyists, reporters, and political staffers pressed against the brass velvet rope.

Under the rules of the House of Delegates, members of the general public and registered lobbyists were strictly barred from crossing that threshold onto the Chamber floor during session. Yet as the Sergeant-at-Arms stepped out of the elevator ahead of our two wheelchairs, the doorkeepers immediately unhooked the velvet rope and swung open the tall mahogany double doors.

“Make way, please—honored guests of the House coming through to the Floor,” the Sergeant-at-Arms announced.

Thirty-five lobbyists in thousand-dollar suits parted in stunned silence as two twenty-six-year-old twins from Virginia Beach rolled their compact black SwiftChairs straight across the threshold onto the lush green carpet of the Virginia House of Delegates Chamber.

Rolling inside at floor level felt completely different from looking at photographs of the chamber. High above us rose the cream-and-gold coffered ceiling and the glittering crystal chandeliers; directly ahead stood the Speaker’s elevated marble rostrum and the twin electronic voting boards listing all one hundred Delegates in alphabetical order. And instead of staring down at the tops of lawmakers’ heads from a distant third-floor balcony, we were rolling right past the curved rows of polished mahogany desks where the elected representatives of the Commonwealth sat.

“Right over here on the outer right aisle, folks,” the Sergeant-at-Arms whispered kindly, guiding our two wheelchairs to a wide, level carpeted bay near the rear row of desks on the first floor—twenty feet from an emergency ground-level exit door. “I figured two folks from Virginia Beach would feel right at home sitting next to one of your hometown Delegates.”

At the mahogany desk immediately beside our wheelchair bay, a dark-haired Delegate in a crisp navy suit—with a brass nameplate on his desk reading MR. VILLA — VIRGINIA BEACH (21ST DISTRICT)—turned around in his leather swivel chair to see who was being seated beside him.

The instant his eyes landed on our two wheelchairs, Delegate Ronald Villa broke into a huge, genuine grin and stood right up to shake our hands.

“Katie! Nate!” Delegate Villa said warmly, clasping Katie’s right hand and then reaching across to shake mine. “What a surprise! How did the two of you manage to score floor seats in the House of Delegates?”

“We tried to go upstairs to the third-floor public viewing gallery, Delegate Villa,” I explained with a grin, “and Capitol Police stopped us because they were worried about how they’d evacuate our wheelchairs down three flights of stairs in an emergency. They talked to House Leadership, and the Sergeant-at-Arms brought us down here to sit next to you.”

“Well, I couldn’t ask for better company on my aisle!” Delegate Villa laughed, gesturing toward the two neighboring delegates seated to his left. “Hey, guys, let me introduce you to Virginia Beach City Councilwoman Katie Prairie from Kempsville and her twin brother Nathaniel. Long before Katie won her Kempsville Council seat, the two of them started the Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit blog. Back when I was serving At-Large on the Virginia Beach City Council before I was elected to the House, I was actively fighting to get more covered bus shelters built for our bus riders so working folks and seniors wouldn’t be standing out in the pouring rain along Kempsville Road, Princess Anne Road, and Holland Road. Every time city staff claimed we didn’t know which bus stops needed shelters the most, Katie and Nate had already ridden every route in their wheelchairs and published the exact stop-by-stop boarding numbers and sidewalk photos on their website!”

The two neighboring delegates smiled and shook our hands across our lap trays as the noon bell rang and the Speaker rapped his wooden gavel to call the House of Delegates to order.

For the next hour and fifteen minutes, Katie and I sat side by side in our SwiftChairs right on the green carpet of the House Floor beside Delegate Ronald Villa’s desk.

Whenever a bill came up on the electronic calendar board, Delegate Villa leaned over his desk armrest between votes to whisper a quick, friendly explanation of the parliamentary procedure—pointing out how the white request-to-speak buttons worked on the desk consoles, how committee chairmen signaled floor amendments, and how the red and green lights on the big wall boards tallied the yeas and nays in real time. Even though he sat on the Republican side of the aisle and knew our transit blog frequently called out state and local leaders in both parties when public transit got shortchanged, Delegate Villa treated us with the warm, unpretentious respect of a former At-Large City Councilman who genuinely cared about the bus riders in his city.

Then, at twelve-forty-five, the budget amendment Katie and I had testified for at nine o’clock that morning came up on the floor—a measure to restore four million dollars in state operating assistance for local public bus systems across Hampton Roads, Richmond, and Northern Virginia.

Sitting right on the House Floor, Katie and I watched the big electronic voting board on the front wall as the bell chimed and the red and green lights blinked on beside each lawmaker’s name.

Right next to us, Delegate Ronald Villa reached forward and pressed his green YEA button to support the transit funds for Hampton Roads.

Across the chamber, however, the incumbent Delegate representing our own Eighty-Fifth House District back home in Kempsville—Delegate Richard Tatum, who had ignored three straight emails Katie had sent him asking for a ten-minute meeting to coordinate state matching funds for Virginia Beach's new evening bus routes—didn't even look up from his cell phone as he reached over and slapped his red NAY button, helping defeat the transit amendment by six votes.

I turned my head slightly to look at my twin sister.

Katie wasn't looking at the floor carpet anymore. Sitting upright in her compact SwiftChair on the floor of the Virginia House of Delegates, her blue eyes were locked onto the mahogany desks and the big electronic voting board at the front of the room. For the first time in her life, the Virginia General Assembly wasn't a distant, abstract institution behind a television glass screen or three stories below a balcony rail. She was sitting right on the Floor. She could see the buttons on the desks. She could hear how the bills were debated. And she could see firsthand that while she had fought for a full year on the Virginia Beach City Council to get evening buses running out of the Municipal Center, the Eighty-Fifth District's own State Delegate up here in Richmond was voting to starve those very same buses of state matching funds.

When the House recessed at one-fifteen and Delegate Villa shook our hands again before heading off to his afternoon committee meeting—promising to keep working with us on bus shelters and regional transit back home in Virginia Beach—Katie and I rolled out the tall mahogany double doors of the House Chamber into the first-floor marble corridor.

As we rode the elevator down toward the underground Capitol tunnel, Katie reached across our wheelchair armrests and took my right hand in a grip so steady and electric that I felt it all the way to my shoulders.

"Nate," Katie whispered as the elevator doors closed around just the two of us.

"Yeah, Katie?" I asked, looking straight into her eyes.

"Being stopped at the third-floor viewing gallery by Capitol Police and brought down to sit on the House Floor beside Delegate Villa today was the best thing that ever could have happened to us," Katie said, her voice quiet and ringing with unmistakable purpose. "Did you see how ordinary those mahogany desks are when you're sitting right next to them on the green carpet? Just like on City Council back home, all it takes to make room for a power wheelchair at one of those desks is pulling out a single wooden swivel chair."

My breath caught in my chest as I realized what my twin sister was saying.

"Richard Tatum didn't even look up from his phone when he voted against our buses today," Katie continued, squeezing my fingers tightly. "We proved on the Virginia Beach City Council that when you put a bus rider in a wheelchair at the table, you can change the schedules for the entire city. But as long as politicians in Richmond keep cutting state transit funds and blocking disability Medicaid waivers, local City Councils are fighting with one hand tied behind their backs. The next House of Delegates election is in November 2013. Let's go home, talk it over with Dad, and map out how we win the Eighty-Fifth District seat."

Part 2: Telling Dad at Our Kempsville Kitchen Table, The 125-Signature Ballot Petition at CCHR, & Winning the Eighty-Fifth House District

Date: 2012-11-23 at 18:30 America/New_York

Friday, November 23, 2012, 6:30 PM — Brainstorming with Dad Around the Kempsville Kitchen Table

"Dad," twenty-seven-year-old Katie said after the three of us had finished our Friday evening Thanksgiving leftovers and I had set three fresh glasses of ice-cold ginger ale down on the oak kitchen table of our house off Military Highway and Indian River Road in Kempsville, "Nate and I have a big decision we want to talk through with you before the end of the year."

Sitting across the table from our two compact SwiftChairs in his flannel shirt, our fifty-four-year-old dad set his glass down, adjusted his eyeglasses, and looked from Katie's face to mine with a knowing fatherly smile.

"Wait—let me guess," Dad said warmly. "The last time the two of you gave me that exact synchronized twin look across this table was back in 2010 right before Katie told me she was going to run against Harold Dietz for the Kempsville seat on the Virginia Beach City Council. Who rattled your cage this time?"

"Delegate Richard Tatum," Katie answered without missing a beat, sliding my MagnaBook Pro laptop across the table so Dad could see the newly redistricted map of the Eighty-Fifth House District glowing on the screen. "Back in February, when Nate and I rode up to Richmond to testify for state public-transit matching funds, Capitol Police stopped us at the third-floor viewing gallery over emergency-evacuation concerns and House Leadership brought us down to sit right on the Floor of the House of Delegates next to Ron Villa's desk. We sat twenty feet away from Richard Tatum and watched him slap his red Nay button against Hampton Roads bus funding without even looking up from his cell phone."

"And after serving two years on the Virginia Beach City Council," I added, tapping the boundary lines on the laptop screen, "we've seen firsthand that almost everything we're trying to fix locally—dedicated regional funding for CVTA, clearing the state developmental-disability Medicaid waiver waitlist for Virginia families raising adults like our cousin Chelsea up in Newport, Rhode Island, and enforcing real accessibility rules—is controlled up in Richmond by the General Assembly. Look at the new decennial map for the Eighty-Fifth House District, Dad: it covers Kempsville, Bellamy Manor, Brandon, and Larkspur, right around Fairlawn Recreation Center on Marlborough Drive. Eighty-five percent of the precincts in the Eighty-Fifth House District are the exact same Kempsville neighborhoods that elected Katie to City Council in 2010."

Dad leaned over the table, studying the precinct map carefully before looking back up at Katie.

“I know my daughter, and I know that once the two of you set your minds to something, nobody in Virginia is going to stop you,” Dad said proudly, though his voice turned serious and practical as he switched into systems-engineer problem-solving mode. “So let’s brainstorm this right now from start to finish before the calendar flips to 2013. Walk me through every step between tonight and swearing-in day in January 2014. First question: Virginia Beach City Council is non-partisan under state law. If you run for the Virginia House of Delegates against Richard Tatum next November, you have to declare a party ballot line. How are you filing?”

“I’m running as a Democrat—Katie Prairie, D-Virginia Beach,” Katie said without a second’s hesitation. “City Council elections are non-partisan by law, so party labels weren’t on the ballot in 2010, but you, Nate, and I have been Democrats our entire lives. Nate and I grew up in a Democratic household watching you vote for the Democratic ticket in every election, Dad. Back when we were teenagers in high school, we would have gladly voted for the Democratic candidates right alongside you if we’d been old enough to cast a ballot, and the three of us have voted Democrat in every single local, state, and federal election since the day Nate and I turned eighteen. Ron Villa has always been fair to us on bus shelters from the Republican side because he came up through City Council, but the House majority caucus in Richmond just spent the whole 2012 session cutting public transit, blocking healthcare expansion, and starving disability services. If I’m going up to Richmond to fight for working families, bus riders, and disabled Virginians, I’m running proudly under the party banner the three of us have always believed in.”

“Damn right,” Dad nodded with a proud grin, pulling a yellow legal pad and a ballpoint pen toward his elbow. “The three of us have never hidden what we stand for. Second question: what happens to your Kempsville seat on the Virginia Beach City Council during the campaign—and what happens to your software business here at home if you win?”

“Under Virginia law, a sitting City Council member does not have to resign her municipal seat just to run for the General Assembly,” I explained, opening the Code of Virginia tab I had bookmarked in our browser. “Katie’s four-year City Council term runs through 2014, and the House of Delegates election is in November 2013. That means Katie keeps representing Kempsville on the Virginia Beach City Council through the entire 2013 campaign so our neighbors never lose their vote at City Hall. Once she wins the House seat in November 2013, she’ll serve through the final December 2013 Council meeting and then formally resign her City Council seat effective December 31, 2013—right before taking her oath in the House of Delegates on the second Wednesday in January 2014.”

“And because the Virginia General Assembly is a part-time citizen legislature,” Katie added, “session only runs for sixty days in even-numbered years and forty-five days in odd-numbered years during January and February. Ten months out of every year, Nate and I stay right here in our house off Military Highway in Kempsville running our software business and riding CVTA buses around the district. For January and February, we’ll rent a one-bedroom accessible apartment right on a JRTC bus route in Richmond.”

Dad wrote Jan–Feb: 60/45-day Winter Session (Richmond Bus Route Apt) at the top of his legal pad, then tapped his pen below it.

“Alright—now walk me through the official election-law timeline under Title 24.2 of the Code of Virginia,” Dad said. “What paperwork has to be filed between January 1, 2013 and the ballot deadline so Tatum’s lawyers can’t try to knock you off the ballot on a technicality?”

I rotated the second browser tab toward Dad, where Katie and I had already built a step-by-step statutory checklist.

“Step one happens on January 2, 2013,” I said. “We file Katie’s Statement of Organization with the Virginia State Board of Elections in the COMET campaign finance system, register Katie Prairie for Delegate, and open a dedicated campaign checking account at our credit union within ten days. Under state law, every candidate committee has to designate an official Campaign Treasurer who lives in Virginia. Katie and I want me to serve as Campaign Manager and Chief Technology Officer—and we want to know if you’ll serve as our official Campaign Treasurer, Dad.”

Dad’s chest swelled visibly behind his glasses. “Try and stop me. I balanced our household books down to the penny when I was putting myself through CCHR after the divorce—I’ll make sure every campaign finance report we file with Richmond reconciles to the cent. What’s step two?”

“Step two is ballot qualification between January 2 and the late-March primary filing deadline,” Katie said, pointing to the four official State Board of Elections forms we had downloaded:

“To qualify for the June Democratic Primary ballot in a House of Delegates district,” Katie explained, “a candidate has to file four things before five o’clock on the March filing deadline: first, the Certificate of Candidate Qualification under Section 24.2-501 certifying that I’m a qualified voter and resident of the Eighty-Fifth House District; second, the Declaration of Candidacy under Section 24.2-520 along with the party primary filing fee paid to the Virginia Beach Treasurer; third, the General Assembly Statement of Economic Interests under Section 30-111 disclosing our fifty-fifty software company and our house here in Kempsville; and fourth—the most important part—the Petition of Qualified Voters under Section 24.2-506.”

“How many valid voter signatures does the Code of Virginia require for a House of Delegates candidate?” Dad asked, poised with his pen.

“The statute requires a minimum of one hundred and twenty-five signatures from qualified, registered voters residing inside the Eighty-Fifth House District, witnessed by a circulator who signs the affidavit on the back of each legal-sized petition sheet before a notary public,” I said. “Professional campaigns sometimes get sloppy and turn in two hundred signatures, and then get disqualified when fifty of the signers turn out to live across the street in the Eighty-First or Twenty-First District. So we aren’t turning in one hundred and twenty-five signatures. We’re going to collect four hundred verified Eighty-Fifth District signatures—and before a single voter signs our clipboard, I’m going to look up their street address live on my laptop against the official Eighty-Fifth District registered-voter file so we have a one-hundred-percent validity rate.”

“And where are we collecting those four hundred signatures?” Dad asked with a grin, already guessing the answer.

“Right at the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus bus transfer loop, along the Kempsville Road and Princess Anne Road bus stops, and out on the neighborhood sidewalks every Saturday morning in January and February,” Katie smiled, reaching across our armrests to take my hand while extending her other hand across the table to Dad. “No paid petition mercenaries from out of town. Just the three of us.”

Dad placed his large, warm hand over both of ours in the center of the kitchen table.

“Then on Saturday, January fifth, I’m driving down from Alexandria with three legal-sized clipboards and a box of black pens,” Dad said. “Let’s put a bus rider in the House of Delegates.”

January to December 2013 — 412 Signatures at CCHR, Canvassing the 85th District, & Passing the Baton on City Council

On the first Saturday morning of January 2013, right after Katie and I filed her Statement of Organization with Dad listed as Treasurer, the three of us set up at the edge of the concrete passenger island at the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus bus loop.

Every time a CVTA Route 12, Route 25, Route 29, or Route 33 bus pulled into the college transfer hub, dozens of Kempsville residents stepped off the doors and recognized Katie immediately as the twenty-seven-year-old City Councilwoman in the black SwiftChair who had fought to keep their evening buses running until ten-thirty at night.

“Councilwoman Prairie! Are those petitions to run for State Delegate against Richard Tatum?” a CCHR nursing instructor asked excitedly on our very first morning, spotting the legal-sized State Board of Elections sheets clipped to Katie’s lap tray. “Give me a pen right now—and wait two seconds while I call my husband and my daughter over from the Route 12 shelter so they can sign too!”

With Dad standing beside our wheelchairs holding the extra clipboards and signing the circulator affidavits in front of a mobile notary at the end of each afternoon, and with me verifying every signer’s address and precinct number on my laptop on the spot, we didn’t just hit the statutory minimum of one hundred and twenty-five signatures—by the end of February, we had collected four hundred and twelve verified signatures from registered Eighty-Fifth District voters.

When the five-o’clock primary filing deadline closed on the last Thursday of March 2013, not a single Democratic challenger had filed against a popular sitting Kempsville City Councilwoman who had turned in four hundred and twelve bulletproof grassroots signatures. The Virginia State Board of Elections officially certified Katie as the Democratic Nominee for the Eighty-Fifth House District without the expense of a June primary.

Two days later, a pair of sleek political consultants from Richmond rode down I-64 and asked to meet us at a restaurant near Pembroke Commons. Spreading glossy brochures across the table, they informed Katie that to run a “serious” House of Delegates campaign in Virginia Beach, she needed to pay their firm a forty-thousand-dollar retainer to lease the state party’s voter-targeting software, hire an out-of-state direct-mail agency, and host high-dollar donor receptions at Oceanfront hotels.

Katie and I listened politely, took a sip of our ginger ales, and turned their entire forty-thousand-dollar sales pitch down flat.

"My brother and I are professional software engineers," Katie told the stunned consultants before we rolled out to catch our bus home. "Nate already wrote our custom PHP precinct-mapping and voter-turnout engine for my 2010 City Council victory, and it runs faster, cleaner, and with better precinct math than anything on K Street. Every dollar small donors give our campaign is going straight into printing accessible literature and reaching voters in Kempsville—not paying commissions to Richmond consultants."

From April through November 2013, the three of us ran the most disciplined grassroots campaign the Eighty-Fifth District had ever seen.

Every weekday after our software client work and Katie's City Council duties, Katie and I rode CVTA buses across the district and rolled down the residential sidewalks of Kempsville, Bellamy Manor, Brandon, and Larkspur. Whenever a house had two or three brick steps up to the front porch, Dad—who drove down from Alexandria every Friday night through Sunday evening, joined during the weekdays by a dozen volunteer CCHR students and fellow bus riders—walked up the steps to knock on the door while Katie and I parked our SwiftChairs right at the bottom of the front walk so the homeowner could step out onto the porch and talk directly with Katie eye-to-eye.

By mid-October, internal polling showed that Katie had erased Delegate Richard Tatum's twelve-point incumbent cushion.

Panicking during the final ten days of the race, Tatum's Richmond campaign consultants dropped a glossy, full-color attack mailer into every mailbox in Kempsville showing a photograph of the steps of the State Capitol with the headline: THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY MOVES FAST—CAN KATIE PRAIRIE KEEP UP? Inside, the mailer sneered that Katie "doesn't even hold a driver's license" and claimed that two twenty-eight-year-old twins who rode the city bus would be "out of their depth in Richmond."

The backlash across Virginia Beach was instantaneous.

Disabled veterans from Naval Air Station Oceana and Little Creek, parents of special-needs children at Morrison Middle School and Northwood High School, senior citizens along Kempsville Road, and hundreds of commuters who rode the evening buses Katie had championed on City Council flooded the local newspaper letters page and local television broadcasts with outrage. Even former At-Large City Councilman and sitting Republican Delegate Ronald Villa over in the neighboring Twenty-First District told a Norfolk newspaper reporter on the record, "Anyone who thinks Katie and Nate Prairie can't keep up at the State Capitol has never watched those two work a transportation budget."

On Election Night—Tuesday, November 5, 2013—sitting side by side with Dad at our kitchen table in Kempsville tracking the eighteen precincts of the Eighty-Fifth House District on my PHP dashboard, we watched the final returns lock in at 8:15 PM:

Katie Prairie (D): 54.4% — Richard Tatum (R, Incumbent): 45.6%.

At twenty-eight years old, my twin sister was officially Delegate-Elect Katie Prairie of the Eighty-Fifth House District.

Over the next eight weeks of November and December 2013, we completed every statutory transition step between Election Night and Opening Day:

First, on the Wednesday and Thursday after the election, the three-member Virginia Beach Electoral Board met at the Municipal Center to conduct the official canvass of precinct returns, transmitting the certified abstract up to the Virginia State Board of Elections in Richmond under Code of Virginia Section 24.2-675 so the Secretary of the Board could mail Katie her official, gold-sealed Certificate of Election.

Second, during the first week of December, we traveled up to Richmond for the one-day House Clerk's administrative intake—receiving Katie's office assignment in Room 518 on the fifth floor of the General Assembly Building—and met via video conference with attorneys at the Division of Legislative Services to draft and pre-file her first three legislative bills on regional transit funding, developmental-disability Medicaid waiver slots, and statewide ADA building enforcement ahead of the December pre-filing deadline.

Third, on the third Tuesday evening of December 2013, Katie rolled up the permanent ramp to the Virginia Beach City Council dais at the Municipal Center one last time. After casting her final municipal votes and thanking the people of Kempsville for three unforgettable years of service on City Council, Katie formally submitted her resignation from the non-partisan Kempsville Council seat effective at 11:59 PM on December 31, 2013—welcoming her newly elected Kempsville Council successor, Councilwoman Amelia Thornton, so she would never hold dual municipal and state legislative office when her House term began.

When Katie and I rolled out of the Municipal Center at nine-thirty that December night and boarded the 9:45 PM CVTA Route 33 bus that she had fought to create, the driver saluted her from behind the wheel.

"Next stop for you two is the State Capitol up in Richmond, Delegate-Elect Prairie!" the driver beamed.

"Only for forty-five and sixty days every winter," Katie smiled, holding my hand across the center aisle between our two wheelchair bays as the bus rolled toward CCHR. "And on Friday, January third, Nate and I are moving into an apartment right on West Broad Street so we can ride the Richmond city bus to the Capitol too."

Freshman Session on West Broad Street & Riding JRTC Route 6 to the Capitol

Part 1: The West Broad Street Loft, Unpacking Our Shared Queen Bed, & Weekend Reconnaissance on JRTC Route 6

Date: 2014-01-03 at 14:15 America/New_York

Friday, January 3, 2014, 2:15 PM — Five Days Ahead of Opening Day at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts

“I still apologize that we only had a one-bedroom accessible apartment left on the ground floor for the legislative session, Delegate Prairie,” the property manager of the Broad & Boulevard Lofts said nervously as he held open the wide oak door of Apartment 104 and handed twenty-eight-year-old Katie two brass keys and a pair of electronic lobby fobs. “When the General Assembly convenes every January, the two-bedroom corporate units book up months in advance. If you and your brother need us to roll a folding cot into the living room—”

“No cot needed at all, Mr. Davenport, thank you,” Katie said with a warm, reassuring smile from her compact black SwiftChair as she rolled smoothly across the threshold ahead of me and our fifty-five-year-old dad. “A one-bedroom apartment with one queen bed is actually the exact layout my brother and I asked for.”

Behind us, pushing a wheeled bellhop cart loaded with our two dark-blue comforter bags from home, our dual laptop stands, and two plastic crates of kitchen staples that he had driven down I-95 from Alexandria in the bed of his pickup truck to meet our morning ARTS train from Norfolk, Dad chuckled softly at the property manager’s polite blink of surprise.

Once Mr. Davenport wished us a good winter in Richmond and stepped back out into the wide brick-and-timber hallway, I clicked the deadbolt shut and looked around our new sixty-day winter sanctuary.

It was Friday, January 3, 2014—five full days before the Virginia General Assembly would gavel in at noon on Wednesday, January 8 for Katie’s very first session representing the Eighty-Fifth House District back home in Kempsville and Virginia Beach.

When Katie had flipped the Eighty-Fifth District seat two months earlier in November 2013—running on the exact public-transit, disability-access, and working-family platform we had spent the previous eight years championing on Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit—party staffers in Richmond had automatically sent us brochures for upscale high-rise apartments down in Shockoe Slip and luxury suites near the downtown hotels where veteran lawmakers stayed during the winter session.

Katie and I had taken one look at the transit map of Richmond and turned every single one of those downtown hotel brochures down.

Instead, we had chosen Apartment 104 inside the Broad & Boulevard Lofts—a renovated brick warehouse building on West Broad Street right near Boulevard at the edge of Scott’s Addition and the Museum District. The building had a flush concrete entrance off the wide West Broad Street sidewalk with zero steps, blue ADA push-button automatic doors, forty-two-inch interior doorways, low-pile commercial carpet, and a roll-in bathroom with steel grab bars. Even better, thirty feet outside the front lobby glass stood a blue-and-white bus stop sign for the James River Transit Company—Richmond’s public bus network, universally known across the capital region as the JRTC Transit System.

“Come look at this view out the living room windows, Nate,” Katie called out, rolling her SwiftChair across the open floor plan toward the two tall industrial sash windows facing south over West Broad Street.

I rolled up beside her left armrest while Dad carried our bedding bags into the bedroom. Right below our first-floor windowsill, a blue-and-white forty-foot JRTC Stalwart low-floor transit bus with an amber LED destination sign reading 6 BROAD STREET — DOWNTOWN / CAPITOL glided past the curb.

“Four separate JRTC trunk routes converge right along this stretch of West Broad Street,” I said, resting my hand over Katie’s fingers on her armrest as we watched a westbound bus pass in the opposite lane thirty seconds later. “Route 6 runs straight down Broad Street past the Science Museum and Central Virginia University to Ninth and Broad at Capitol Square in eleven minutes, and straight west to the shops and grocery store at Oak Lawn in ten minutes.”

“And arriving five days early gives us all of Saturday and Sunday to learn the bus routes, test every transfer stop, and get our routine locked down before Monday morning’s New Member Orientation even starts,” Katie said, letting out a quiet, contented breath as her shoulders relaxed.

Because both of us were autistic, rolling cold into an unfamiliar city and a brand-new legislative building on the same morning would have been a recipe for sensory overload. Coming up to Richmond five days ahead of Wednesday’s Opening Day gavel wasn’t a vacation; it was how Katie and I mapped our perimeter so that by the time the session bell rang, every doorway, curb cut, bus stop, and timetable between our bed and the House Floor felt completely predictable.

We rolled into the bedroom to help Dad finish unpacking.

Although the apartment came furnished with a solid oak queen bedframe, a firm mattress, and two nightstands, Katie and I never slept well under stiff, bleach-scented corporate rental linens. Dad had already stripped off the rental bedspread and folded it onto the top closet shelf, and together the three of us spread out our own familiar cotton sheets, our heavy navy-blue winter comforter, and our four pillows from our shared bedroom back home in Kempsville.

“There,” Katie said happily, smoothing the corner of our comforter from her wheelchair while I plugged our dual powerchair chargers into the wall outlet at the foot of the bed. “Now it smells like home.”

Out in the front room, Dad helped us push the rectangular oak dining table right up in front of the tall windows overlooking West Broad Street. Within forty minutes, we had our two MagnaBook Pro laptops, our dual twenty-four-inch external monitors, our hardware firewall router, and our portable video-capture encoder cabled neatly across the tabletop.

Before Dad headed back out to his pickup truck at five-thirty to beat the Friday evening traffic north up I-95 to his house on Sunset Drive in Alexandria, he stood by the front door and pulled both of us into a long, tight hug across our wheelchair armrests.

“If anybody at that Capitol gives my daughter or my son a hard time next week, you call me,” Dad said fiercely, kissing the top of Katie’s blonde head and clapping my shoulder.

“We’ll be fine, Dad,” Katie smiled, hugging him back as I squeezed his forearm. “We’ve got each other, we’ve got our laptops, and we’ve got a bus stop thirty feet from the front door.”

That Friday night, after eating a quiet supper of toasted cheese sandwiches and tomato soup at our window table while watching the headlights and blue-and-white JRTC buses roll down West Broad Street, Katie and I parked our two SwiftChairs beside the untouched queen bed in our exposed-brick bedroom and transferred down into our quilted navy-blue sleeping bag on the carpeted floor of the walk-in closet. Wrapping both arms closely around each other with Katie’s cheek resting against my chest—feeling the calming deep pressure that always grounded us best in a brand-new city—we drifted off to sleep safe inside our new Richmond perimeter.

Saturday & Sunday, January 4–5, 2014 — Buying Regular 30-Day JRTC Passes & Mapping the Broad Street Spine

At nine o’clock on Saturday morning, bundled up in our matching winter parkas, knit gloves, and wool scarves with our canvas backpacks hooked behind our wheelchair headrests, Katie and I rolled out the automatic glass doors of the Broad & Boulevard Lofts to the West Broad Street bus stop.

The January air was crisp and clear at thirty-six degrees. Three minutes after we braked our SwiftChairs on the concrete waiting pad alongside a Central Virginia University nursing student and two restaurant cooks heading downtown for the Saturday lunch shift, an eastbound JRTC Route 6 Stalwart low-floor bus pulled smoothly to the curb.

The air brakes hissed, and as the front doors folded open and the front air suspension dropped four inches toward the sidewalk, the bus’s external automated voice annunciator spoke through the doorway speaker in its crisp, unmistakable cadence—announcing the route once as the doors opened before switching to the safety warnings as the stainless-steel front flip-ramp folded out onto the concrete:

“Route 6. Downtown. Welcome aboard JRTC!”

“Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: lift is deploying!”

“Morning, folks! Watch your roll coming aboard,” the JRTC operator called out cheerfully, reaching down to flip up the two bench seats over the front left and right wheelchair securement bays.

“Good morning!” Katie said brightly as she rolled up the gentle slope of the low-floor ramp first and backed her SwiftChair deftly into the curbside wheelchair bay, while I rolled right up behind her into the street-side bay across the narrow aisle.

“Caution: lift is stowing!” the automated voice announced as the stainless-steel ramp folded back into the front threshold step with a solid clank.

After the operator clicked the four-point retractable floor straps onto our wheelchair frames and returned to his seat, Katie and I each reached forward to the farebox beside the steering column and fed crisp dollar bills into the bill validator to pay our standard one-dollar-and-fifty-cent base fares like any other rider in Richmond.

“Where are you two headed this cold Saturday morning?” the operator asked as he pulled the forty-foot bus back into the eastbound lane of West Broad Street.

“Ninth and Broad first so we can roll over to the JRTC customer service window and buy our thirty-day unlimited magnetic swipe passes for the winter,” Katie replied, holding my hand across the center aisle between our two wheelchair bays. “We’re staying right back there at Broad and Boulevard through the middle of March.”

“Well, you picked the best bus line in the city of Richmond to live on,” the driver said with a proud grin in his wide rearview mirror. “Between the 6, the 1, the 2, and the 3, you won’t ever wait more than ten minutes on Broad Street from six in the morning till midnight.”

As the bus rolled straight east down the wide six-lane boulevard—passing the domed neoclassical rotunda of the Science Museum of Virginia in the old Broad Street Union Station, the brick dormitories and classrooms of Central Virginia University around Monroe Park, and the historic storefronts of the Arts District—I had my pocket notebook open on my lap tray, logging the exact travel times and stop spacing while the interior automated voice announced every single cross street we passed, whether there was a bus stop on that block or not:

“Robinson Street.”

“Mulberry Street.”

“Allison Street.”

“Meadow Street.”

“Lombardy Street.”

“Belvidere Street.”

“Listen to the onboard GPS annunciator, Katie,” I murmured with an appreciative grin as the voice called out “First Street”, “Second Street”, “Third Street” in steady sequence down the straight Broad Street corridor. “It announces every single cross street along the route even when it isn’t a bus stop—and whenever a JRTC bus completes a turn, it announces both streets on the corner. For a blind rider or someone visiting Richmond for the first time, you always know down to the exact block where you are.”

“Eighth Street. Ninth Street.”

Eleven minutes after boarding outside our apartment, the bus pulled up to the curb at Ninth and Broad Street—directly across from the tall granite tower of the General Assembly Building and the wrought-iron gates of Capitol Square.

“Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: lift is deploying!”

After thanking the driver and rolling down the front ramp onto the brick sidewalk at Ninth and Broad, Katie and I stopped by the downtown transit ticket counter, paid sixty dollars apiece out of our own checking account for two standard thirty-day unlimited JRTC magnetic swipe passes, and spent the next three hours testing the entire downtown pedestrian and transit grid in our powerchairs.

We rolled down the Ninth Street hill to Ninth and Main to time the bus transfer down to Richmond Main Street Station in Shockoe Bottom—listening at the intersection corner as a turning bus announced externally to the crosswalk, "Caution! Bus is turning right. Pedestrians, look both ways!" followed inside by both street names as it straightened out onto Main Street. We tested the exterior brick ramps leading into Capitol Square and located the ground-level accessible entrance on the north terrace of Thomas Jefferson's historic white-columned State Capitol. We checked the elevator lobby inside the General Assembly Building at Ninth and Broad, noting exactly how many minutes it took to roll from the Route 6 bus stop curb into the building, clear the security magnetometer, and ride up to the fifth-floor legislative offices.

Then, at one-thirty in the afternoon, we rolled back out to the westbound bus shelter at Ninth and Broad. When the outbound bus pulled up to the curb and the front doors folded open, the automated voice announced once across the sidewalk:

"Route 6. Oak Lawn. Welcome aboard JRTC!"

"Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: lift is deploying!"

Rolling aboard, we swiped our new thirty-day JRTC magnetic passes through the farebox reader with a clean electronic beep and rode Route 6 all the way past our apartment building out West Broad Street to the Oak Lawn transfer center.

Rolling down the wide sidewalk of the open-air Oak Lawn shopping plaza, we went straight into the Market Square supermarket. With an insulated canvas grocery carrier clipped to the rear frame of each of our SwiftChairs and two hand baskets resting on our lap trays, Katie and I spent an hour picking out two weeks' worth of breakfast cereal, milk, whole-wheat bread, sliced turkey, pasta, fresh apples, and three twelve-packs of ginger ale.

By four o'clock Saturday afternoon, we had ridden JRTC Route 6 ten blocks back east to our apartment stop at Broad and Boulevard, unloaded our groceries into our kitchen cabinets, and spent Sunday afternoon sitting side by side at our front window table writing a two-thousand-word weekend dispatch for Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit:

> What Hampton Roads Can Learn from Richmond's Broad Street Trunk Line: How JRTC Uses a Straight Six-Mile Spine to Deliver Ten-Minute Service

By Sunday night, we knew every bus stop, every curb cut, and every timetable along Broad Street by heart. We were ready for Monday morning.

Part 2: Gold License Plates vs. JRTC Route 6, Turning Down the Parking Deck Pass, & The 60-Inch ADA Restroom Showdown

Date: 2014-01-06 at 08:15 America/New_York

Monday, January 6, 2014, 8:15 AM — The First Time Richmond Politicians See a Delegate Roll Off the City Bus

At eight-fifteen on Monday morning—forty-eight hours before the 2014 General Assembly would formally convene—the intersection of Ninth and Broad Street outside the General Assembly Building looked like a luxury auto dealership convention.

All along the curb leading toward the private legislative parking deck at Seventh and Marshall, gleaming black luxury sedans and massive chrome-trimmed SUVs idled in a bumper-to-bumper line. Nearly every bumper bore a special gold-embossed state license plate reading VIRGINIA — HOUSE OF DELEGATES or VIRGINIA — SENATE, stamped with the lawmaker's low seniority number. On the wide brick sidewalk flanking the bronze revolving doors of the General Assembly Building, groups of veteran Delegates, State Senators in tailored wool overcoats, and high-priced corporate lobbyists stood clutching leather briefcases and paper coffee cups from the downtown luxury hotels, trading back-slaps and committee gossip in the cold morning sunshine.

None of them paid the slightest attention to the public JRTC bus stop sign planted at the curb thirty feet from the General Assembly Building's accessible side doors—where half a dozen state clerical workers and hospital aides were waiting to step off the morning bus.

With a low rumble of its diesel engine and a crisp hiss of air brakes, our eastbound blue-and-white JRTC Route 6 Broad Street bus pulled up to the Ninth and Broad curb stop after calling out "Eighth Street" and "Ninth Street" inside the cabin.

As the front doors folded open, the external automated voice rang out across the sidewalk:

"Route 6. Downtown. Welcome aboard JRTC!"

"Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: lift is deploying!"

Inside the front vestibule, where Katie and I had just ridden the eleven-minute trip down from Broad and Boulevard after swiping our regular sixty-dollar monthly passes at the farebox, the operator unhooked our floor straps as the stainless-steel wheelchair ramp settled onto the brick sidewalk.

"Have a great first week at the Capitol, Katie and Nate!" the operator called out warmly over his shoulder. "Show 'em how we do things on Route 6!"

"Thank you, Marcus! See you at five-thirty this evening!" Katie called back cheerfully.

Wearing a tailored royal-blue wool blazer over a crisp white blouse—with the small gold seal of the Virginia House of Delegates pinned to her left lapel and her leather legislative portfolio resting on her lap tray—twenty-eight-year-old Freshman Delegate Katie Prairie eased her joystick forward and rolled her compact black SwiftChair briskly down the city bus ramp onto the Ninth and Broad sidewalk.

Three seconds later, wearing my charcoal wool jacket with both of our MagnaBook Pro laptops strapped securely across my lap tray, I rolled my matching SwiftChair down the bus ramp right behind my twin sister.

"Caution: lift is stowing!" the automated voice announced behind us as the bus ramp folded back up with a hydraulic clank and the blue-and-white JRTC bus pulled away into the Broad Street traffic.

Outside the General Assembly Building doors, the morning chatter stopped dead.

Six veteran Delegates, two senior State Senators who had just stepped out of a town car, and a circle of corporate telecommunications lobbyists standing beside the granite columns all froze in their tracks. Three of the lobbyists literally lowered their coffee cups halfway from their mouths, staring from the retreating tailpipe of the city transit bus to the gold House of Delegates member pin gleaming on the lapel of Katie's blazer as our two power wheelchairs rolled side by side toward the entrance.

One of the veteran lawmakers—a silver-haired, five-term Delegate from Northern Virginia who sat on the House Transportation Committee and still had his gold-plated SUV keys dangling from his gloved fingers—took two steps across the brick sidewalk and blinked down at us in utter bewilderment.

"Excuse me—Delegate-Elect Prairie?" he stammered, glancing back over his shoulder toward the empty bus stop curb as if checking for a hidden camera crew. "From the Eighty-Fifth District in Virginia Beach?"

"Good morning, Delegate!" Katie said brightly, braking her SwiftChair beside mine to shake his hand. "And this is my twin brother, business partner, and volunteer data strategist, Nathaniel Prairie."

"Did—did the two of you just get off the city bus?" the veteran Delegate asked, his voice loud enough that a dozen other lawmakers and lobbyists turned their heads to listen. "Don't you have a handicap van or a legislative driver? The Clerk's office reserves oversized accessible spaces on the ground level of the Seventh Street legislative parking deck for members!"

Katie exchanged a quick, amused twin look with me before looking back up at him with complete, unbothered sincerity.

"Why on earth would we drive a car in downtown traffic when JRTC Route 6 picks us up thirty feet outside our apartment on West Broad Street every ten minutes and drops us right here at the front door of the General Assembly Building?" Katie asked smoothly. "A thirty-day unlimited JRTC bus pass costs sixty dollars at the ticket window, the low-floor ramp takes ten seconds to deploy, and my brother and I get to spend our eleven-minute commute talking with the regular working people of Richmond who ride the bus every day. That's how we commute back home on CVTA in Virginia Beach and Norfolk too."

Around the entrance plaza, several lobbyists exchanged stunned glances—realizing at once that the twenty-eight-year-old software developer from Virginia Beach who had just unseated an incumbent by campaigning from her power wheelchair on public buses wasn't doing it as a campaign-season photo op. She actually lived it every single day.

Five minutes later, when we rolled inside the warm marble lobby of the General Assembly Building and checked in at the Clerk's administrative orientation table, the facilities coordinator smiled and slid a thick manila packet across the counter toward Katie's lap tray.

"Welcome to Richmond, Delegate Prairie," the coordinator said, holding up a plastic windshield RFID transponder alongside a DMV application form for special official HOUSE OF DELEGATES license plates. "Because both you and your brother use power wheelchairs, we went ahead and blocked off two contiguous van-accessible spaces right next to the basement tunnel elevator in the General Assembly Parking Deck. Here is your garage transponder and your legislative license-plate form."

Katie gently pushed the plastic garage transponder and the HOUSE OF DELEGATES license-plate application right back across the counter.

"Thank you so much for thinking of us," Katie said kindly, "but neither Nate nor I can drive due to our medical restrictions, and neither of us owns a car—so there isn't any vehicle to put House of Delegates license plates on. Whenever anyone does drive us in a private vehicle, the only person we want behind the wheel is our dad in his own truck, and as a State Delegate I'm thankfully not the President of the United States being forced to ride around in an armored Secret Service limousine. We bought our thirty-day JRTC bus passes on Saturday and we're riding Route 6 down Broad Street every morning and evening. Please reassign those two ground-floor parking spaces to Capitol custodians or building maintenance staff who have to drive in before dawn—they deserve a close parking spot a whole lot more than we do."

The orientation clerk stared at the returned garage transponder on the table as if nobody in the four-hundred-year history of the Virginia General Assembly had ever voluntarily given back a reserved downtown parking pass.

Monday Afternoon & Tuesday, January 6–7, 2014 — The Steel Tape Measure & The 60-Inch ADA Restroom Showdown

While Katie didn't care one bit about a VIP parking space or a gold license plate, we discovered at one-thirty that Monday afternoon what she was willing to go to war over before her first session even gaveled in.

After spending the morning getting our legislative network credentials, setting up Katie's new fifth-floor office in Room 518 of the General Assembly Building, and eating a quick lunch in the basement cafeteria, Katie and I rode the elevator down to the underground concourse tunnel and rolled up into the first floor of the historic State Capitol to inspect the accessible desk that the Clerk's staff had modified for her at the end of the minority aisle on the House Floor.

The desk itself on the green carpet of the House Chamber was fine—they had removed the standard mahogany swivel chair so Katie's compact SwiftChair could roll straight under the writing surface within easy reach of the gooseneck microphone and the electronic voting buttons.

The problem came ten minutes later, when we rolled out into the first-floor marble corridor near the House cloakroom and Katie went to use the nearest ladies' restroom while I rolled toward the men's room next door.

Less than thirty seconds after Katie pushed her way past the heavy, spring-loaded solid-oak outer door of the women's restroom—which didn't even have a blue ADA automatic push-button opener on the wall—she backed right back out into the corridor with her jaw set and a familiar flash of storm-cloud steel in her blue eyes.

At the exact same moment, I backed my SwiftChair out of the men's restroom entrance twenty feet down the hall.

"How bad is the women's side?" I asked, rolling quickly up beside her.

"Go look inside the doorway while it's empty, Nate," Katie said tightly, reaching into the side pocket of my backpack and pulling out the twenty-five-foot retractable steel tape measure we always carried for site audits. "It's the exact same fake 'retrofitted' stall they have up on the fifth floor near our office."

I checked that the restroom was unoccupied and looked inside the entrance as Katie pulled out the yellow steel tape blade and measured the end stall.

Whoever had signed off on the restroom renovation twenty years earlier had clearly never sat in a wheelchair a day in their life. They had simply bolted two chrome grab bars onto the tile wall of a forty-two-inch-wide stall at the end of a narrow forty-inch aisle and hung an ACCESSIBLE plaque on a stall door that swung inward toward the porcelain toilet bowl.

When Katie rolled her compact SwiftChair inside the stall frame, her front footrests stopped two inches short of the toilet bowl while the rear battery casing of her wheelchair still stuck eight inches out past the door jamb—making it physically impossible to pull the inward-swinging stall door closed behind her. To use the restroom at all, any wheelchair user would either have to leave the stall door wide open to the entire room or take two separate elevators down through the underground tunnel to a single unisex medical restroom in the far basement corner of the complex—a twenty-minute round trip that would cause a sitting Delegate to miss roll-call floor votes.

"Forty-two inches wide by fifty-four inches deep, with an inward-swinging door and zero sixty-inch turning circle," I said, writing the exact measurements into my notebook while Katie snapped the steel tape measure back into its casing. "That fails federal ADA Accessibility Guidelines Section 4.17.3 on three separate counts."

"And there are plenty of extra square feet at the end of both restroom rows if they simply shift the outer laminate partition twelve inches toward the dead vanity corner and reverse the hinges so the stall door swings outward," Katie said, her voice calm, quiet, and utterly immovable. "Come on, Nate. Let's go pay a visit to the Department of General Services Facilities Director before two-thirty."

Ten minutes later, Katie and I rolled our two SwiftChairs side by side into the Capitol Facilities Management suite on the lower level.

When the Deputy Director for Capitol Facilities came out to the reception counter in his gray suit, he offered Katie the indulgent, patronizing smile of a career bureaucrat who assumed a twenty-eight-year-old freshman in the minority party could be brushed off with paperwork jargon.

“Delegate-Elect Prairie, we appreciate your feedback,” the Deputy Director said smoothly, folding his hands across his stomach, “and I assure you that accessibility upgrades are part of our long-term Master Capitol Complex Modernization Plan. However, modifying restroom partitions and installing motorized door actuators in the General Assembly Building and the Capitol requires an architectural engineering review, historical preservation sign-off, and a capital-outlay work order. Realistically, we can put that in the queue for the summer interim after the session adjourns in March.”

Katie didn’t raise her voice by a single decibel. Instead, she set our steel tape measure down on the counter with a crisp clack and looked straight up into his eyes from her SwiftChair.

“Let me explain what is actually going to happen between now and Wednesday at twelve o’clock noon,” Katie said evenly. “The partitions on the fifth floor of the General Assembly Building and in the first-floor corridor restrooms outside the House Chamber aren’t Thomas Jefferson’s historic plaster—they’re standard bolt-together powder-coated steel commercial bathroom dividers installed in the nineteen-nineties. Under federal ADA Accessibility Guidelines Section 4.17.3, a standard wheelchair toilet stall is required by federal law to provide a minimum sixty-inch clear width and a stall door that clears the turning envelope. Right now, a sitting member of the Virginia House of Delegates cannot close the bathroom stall door in her own workplace.”

The Deputy Director shifted his weight uncomfortably. “Delegate Prairie, our carpenter and electrical shops are completely booked with pre-session podium setups—”

“At twelve o’clock noon on Wednesday, every television network camera in the Commonwealth of Virginia is going to be rolling live in the House Chamber for Opening Day,” Katie continued without blinking, her left hand resting on my wrist across our wheelchair armrests. “If the fifth-floor restrooms and the first-floor House corridor restrooms do not have outward-swinging stall doors, a full sixty-inch turning clearance, and working ADA push-button outer door openers by five o’clock tomorrow afternoon, my very first act as a sworn Delegate on Wednesday will be rising on a point of personal privilege on live statewide television—and inviting the Speaker of the House and the entire Capitol press corps to follow me out into the hallway with their cameras so the voters of Virginia can watch a female Delegate in a power wheelchair get wedged halfway out of an illegal forty-two-inch bathroom stall door because Facilities told her to wait until March.”

The silence in the Facilities office was absolute.

Behind the reception glass, two maintenance supervisors who had been listening over their clipboards traded a wide-eyed look. The Deputy Director’s face went pale as he pictured the six-o’clock Wednesday evening news showing a newly sworn twenty-eight-year-old Delegate in a wheelchair stuck in an open bathroom stall door while trying to cast her first floor votes.

“I—let me call the carpentry foreman and the electrical shop chief right now,” the Deputy Director said quickly, reaching for his desk telephone. “We have heavy-duty commercial partition brackets and two power-door actuator kits in the maintenance warehouse off Fourteenth Street.”

“Thank you,” Katie said politely, picking our steel tape measure back up off the counter. “Nate and I will be working in Room 518 until five o’clock today and all day tomorrow. Feel free to ask us to test the turning radius with our chairs before your crew bolts the brackets down.”

By four o’clock on Tuesday afternoon—twenty hours before the Opening Day gavel—the carpentry and electrical crews had shifted the end partitions fourteen inches into the dead alcove space, reversed the heavy chrome hinges so the stall doors swung cleanly outward with interior loop pulls, and mounted blue wireless ADA push-button door openers outside both the women’s and men’s restrooms on the fifth floor and outside the House Chamber.

When the head carpenter asked Katie and me to test the finished stalls at four-fifteen on Tuesday, Katie rolled her SwiftChair effortlessly inside, spun a full three-hundred-and-sixty-degree circle without her footrests touching a single wall, pulled the outward-swinging door shut with the interior D-ring handle, and rolled back out to shake every carpenter and electrician’s hand in person.

“Nobody should ever have to beg for the right to close a bathroom door in privacy,” Katie told me quietly as we rolled out the front entrance of the General Assembly Building at five o’clock that Tuesday evening to catch our westbound JRTC Route 6 bus back to Broad and Boulevard.

On Wednesday morning, January 8, 2014, when the blue-and-white JRTC Route 6 bus kneeled at the curb of Ninth and Broad at ten-thirty ahead of the noon Opening Day swearing-in ceremony—with Dad waiting proudly for us on the brick sidewalk outside the Capitol gate in his best navy suit—none of the veteran politicians or lobbyists by the entrance looked surprised anymore when the front wheelchair ramp folded down.

Inside the House of Delegates Chamber at twelve o’clock noon, while Dad stood beside my SwiftChair next to Katie’s modified desk on the first-floor chamber carpet, the Clerk of the House called the freshman class forward to take the constitutional oath of office under Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of Virginia.

Just as she had done when she was sworn onto the Virginia Beach City Council three years earlier, Katie didn’t reach for a Bible, and she didn’t pretend to believe in a religion or a god that neither of us believed in. Instead, exercising her explicit constitutional right under Article VI, Clause 3 of the United States Constitution, Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of Virginia, and Section 49-9 of the Code of Virginia to affirm rather than swear—and to omit the optional parenthetical religious phrase at the end—Katie placed her left palm squarely on the gold-stamped cover of the Virginia Constitution resting across my lap tray between our two wheelchairs, raised her right hand toward the Speaker’s rostrum, and spoke her constitutional affirmation as the sole elected Delegate for the Eighty-Fifth District in a clear, ringing voice:

“I do solemnly affirm that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent upon me as a member of the House of Delegates, according to the best of my ability.”

Across the center aisle, three senior opposition delegates immediately craned their necks, whispering indignantly to a political blogger in the front press row that the new twenty-eight-year-old Democrat from Virginia Beach had placed her hand on a copy of the state Constitution instead of a Bible, said “affirm” instead of “swear,” and left out “so help me God.” By five o’clock that evening, conservative talk-radio hosts in Richmond and Tidewater—along with the televangelist commentators on The 777 Circle broadcasting out of the Covenant Broadcasting Network studios right off Indian River Road back home in Virginia Beach—were already having a field day over it, only for Katie to tell a Capitol corridor reporter with a calm, unbothered smile as we rolled out to catch our evening bus:

“Have the commentators complaining on television actually read the Constitution of the United States or the Constitution of Virginia? Article VI, Clause 3 of the United States Constitution states in plain English that all state legislators shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation to support the Constitution, and that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust. And if you open Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of Virginia—the exact document I placed my left hand on today—the words ‘or affirm’ and ‘so help me God’ are printed in parentheses specifically because Virginia law guarantees every non-religious citizen the right to make a solemn secular affirmation. I wasn’t elected to be anybody’s pastor, and my left hand belongs on the exact Constitution I just affirmed to the people of Virginia Beach that I would defend.”

Delegate Katie Prairie of Virginia Beach and her twin brother Nate had arrived in Richmond on the city bus, paid their regular fare, watched Katie affirm her constitutional oath of office on the Constitution of Virginia without bowing to a religious test, and made it crystal clear from Day One that the people’s House belonged to everyone.

House Bill 663 & Live on Meet the Nation

Part 1: Line 18, Seated by Delegate Ronald Villa on the Floor, & A Question Across the Chamber

Date: 2016-02-04 at 11:35 America/New_York

Thursday, February 4, 2016, 11:35 AM — The Capitol Tunnel & Splitting Up at the Chamber Doors

“Look at Line 18 on Page 1 again, Nate,” my twin sister Katie said, tapping her yellow highlighter against the two-page bill printout resting on her lap tray as our compact SwiftChairs rolled side by side down the long underground concourse tunnel connecting the General Assembly Building to the historic Virginia State Capitol. “‘Anatomical sex means the physical condition of being male or female, which is determined by a person’s anatomy.’ Not a birth certificate, not a driver’s license, and not how someone lives their daily life—strictly their physical anatomy. And then look at Line 54 on Page 2: ‘Any person who willfully and knowingly violates this section shall be liable for a civil penalty of not more than fifty dollars,’ enforced by a law enforcement officer’s summons.”

“I read it three times while I was setting up the daily calendar script this morning—and even Sam, Mandy, and Sarah spotted the flaw in ten seconds flat when they dropped off the morning floor packet in Room 518,” I replied, steering my wheelchair smoothly beside hers past the subterranean security desk as the fifteen-minute warning bell for the noon floor session chimed from the bronze wall speakers overhead. “Delegate Cobb and Delegate Marsh put it straight onto today’s Second Reading floor calendar out of the General Laws Committee. Because it didn’t come through any of your three committees, they think everybody on the Floor is going to treat it like a routine committee bill and wave it through before lunch.”

It was thirty-year-old Katie’s second two-year term representing the Eighty-Fifth House District back home in Kempsville and Virginia Beach, and she sat as a rank-and-file member of the thirty-four-seat Democratic minority facing a sixty-six-seat Republican supermajority. In the hierarchy of the Virginia House of Delegates, Katie held no leadership office—not Speaker, not Majority or Minority Leader, not Whip, and not a committee gavel. The chamber was presided over from the high marble rostrum by the Republican Speaker of the House, William J. Harwell of Stafford, who referred all legislation to committees and appointed every standing committee roster, while the sixty-six-member Republican majority on the floor was managed from the front row of the center aisle by House Majority Leader Richard Callaway of Danville, flanked by Deputy Majority Leader Todd Gentry, Majority Whip Jackson Milligan, and Republican Caucus Chair Timothy Hughes, across from our Democratic Minority Leader, Tom Toscano, along with Democratic Whip Eileen Fillmore and Democratic Caucus Chair Kenneth Plumley.

As a second-term opposition delegate who used a power wheelchair full-time, medically could not drive, and rode public buses and passenger trains everywhere she went, Katie served on three standing committees where she could do the most practical good for working families: the House Committee on Transportation, the House Committee on Health, Welfare and Institutions, and the House Committee on Education. On the Transportation Committee, whenever a colleague from a suburban district casually remarked in a hearing that “people can always drive,” Katie would look calmly across the committee table from her SwiftChair and reply, “No, they can’t. I took the bus here.”

House Bill 663 had not come through Transportation, Health, Welfare and Institutions, or Education. It had been reported out of someone else’s committee—the House Committee on General Laws, chaired by Delegate Gilbert Peace—where the majority had advanced it to the House Floor without anyone asking what the statutory words actually required a human being to do.

Every day the General Assembly was in session during January and February, the two of us operated by the exact same synchronized routine we had followed since her freshman session in 2014: we woke up in our accessible one-bedroom winter-session apartment at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts on West Broad Street, rode the eastbound JRTC Route 6 bus straight down Broad Street to Ninth and Broad, and went over every bill on the daily House calendar line by statutory line the exact same way we audited PHP code or Coastal Virginia Transit Authority bus schedules. Twenty minutes earlier upstairs in Room 518, when our three favorite thirteen-year-old middle-school House Pages—eighth-grade triplets Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins from Southside Virginia, who followed Katie around the Capitol whenever they had a free courier run—had delivered the printed Second Reading calendar packet to Katie’s desk, Katie had handed each of them a copy of House Bill 663.

Thirteen-year-old Sarah had reached the operative language on Line 18 first. She wasn't trying to make a political or constitutional argument; as a literal, rule-following thirteen-year-old autistic girl, she had simply applied the proposed statutory rule to herself—I am a girl, and this bill says I am allowed into the girls' room because of my anatomy—read the definition twice, and looked up at Katie with genuine fear in her eyes.

"Delegate Prairie?" Sarah had asked softly, pointing a finger at Line 18 on the page.

"Yeah, Sarah?" Katie had answered.

"Wait," Sarah had said, her voice tight. "Does somebody have to see my parts to prove I'm a girl?"

Katie had stopped reading completely.

Right beside her twin sister, Mandy had immediately looked over Sarah's shoulder at the page. "What?"

"It says which bathroom I can use depends on my anatomy," Sarah had said.

"So how do they know?" their brother Sam had asked, looking up from his copy.

Katie had gently taken the printout back from Sarah's hand. For three seconds, the office had gone dead quiet as my sister read Line 18 and Line 54 again.

"That's a very good question," Katie had said softly.

"Maybe your birth certificate?" Mandy had suggested, squinting at her copy of the bill.

"The bill doesn't say that," Katie had told her.

"A doctor?" Sam had asked.

"Doesn't say that either," Katie had replied.

"But they don't know," Sarah had said literally.

"Right," Katie had agreed.

"Everybody knows Sarah's a girl," Mandy had said reassuringly, taking her sister's hand.

"But how?" Sarah had asked.

"The bill says anatomy," Sam had pointed out. "Not your Page badge, and not how you're dressed."

"Exactly," Katie had said, as the software-developer quality-assurance part of our brains clicked straight into gear. If you stress-tested House Bill 663 the way we stress-tested a software routine before production—input: an accusation that someone used the wrong restroom; required statutory determination: anatomical sex; evidence specified by statute: none; verification procedure: none; authorized investigator: unspecified; standard of proof: unspecified; privacy protections for minors: unspecified—the entire statute collapsed into a terrifying Fourth Amendment hole.

Looking straight into thirteen-year-old Sarah's eyes first so the frightened eighth-grader would know she was safe, Katie had said gently, "Sarah, nobody should ever have to see your private parts for you to use a bathroom."

Sarah had let out a long, relieved breath. "Okay."

Then Katie had looked back down at the yellow-highlighted text of House Bill 663, her blue eyes hardening into flint. "Which means the Gentleman from Spotsylvania has some explaining to do."

We rode the subterranean elevator up into the historic Capitol and rolled out onto the first-floor marble corridor just outside the tall mahogany double doors of the House Chamber. Lobbyists, school groups, and legislative aides were hurrying past the white marble columns as the ten-minute bell sounded.

At the velvet brass rope flanking the Chamber entrance—where the Sergeant-at-Arms staff checked member pins—Katie braked her SwiftChair and turned toward me.

Ever since our very first visit to the State Capitol back in February 2011—when Capitol Police had stopped us outside the third-floor public viewing gallery because the small historic elevator locked out during fire alarms and there was no safe way to evacuate a wheelchair down three flights of eighteenth-century stairs—House Leadership and the Sergeant-at-Arms had maintained a standing ADA floor pass for me (and any visiting constituent in a wheelchair plus one companion) to watch the daily session from a level wheelchair bay inside the first-floor House Chamber itself, right along the outer right aisle beside our fellow Virginia Beach lawmaker, Delegate Ronald Villa of the Twenty-First District.

"Are you set to plug into the floor feed over by Ron's desk?" Katie asked, reaching across our armrests to give my right hand our familiar twin squeeze.

"All set," I said, patting the padded laptop bag strapped across my lap tray where my MagnaBook Pro and my digital stream-capture rig were tucked alongside our daily legislative binder. "I'll have the chamber stream hooked into my laptop before the Speaker bangs the gavel so I can record and caption your remarks for the constituent archive."

"Wait until Delegate Cobb finishes his floor pitch on House Bill 663," Katie said, her blue eyes steady and focused as she tucked the highlighted two-page printout under her left wrist on the lap tray. "I'm going to ask the Speaker to let me put one direct operational question to him on the record."

"Give him hell, Delegate Prairie," I whispered with a small smile.

"See you at the center doors when we recess," Katie said warmly.

Releasing my hand, my twin sister eased her joystick forward, nodded to the doorkeeper holding open the left-hand mahogany door, and rolled her compact black power wheelchair across the green carpet toward her modified accessible desk at the end of the far left minority aisle.

I flashed my gold-stamped ADA floor pass to the Sergeant-at-Arms assistant at the right-hand doorway and rolled quietly inside to the designated wheelchair bay along the outer right aisle, twenty feet from the ground-level emergency exit.

Right beside my bay, seated at his mahogany desk bearing the brass nameplate MR. VILLA — VIRGINIA BEACH (21ST DISTRICT), Delegate Ronald Villa looked up from his leather binder and gave me a warm, familiar nod.

“Morning, Nate,” Delegate Villa whispered, reaching over to shake my hand just as he had done the very first day the Sergeant-at-Arms had brought Katie and me onto the Floor back in 2011. “How’s the Route 6 bus running down Broad Street this morning?”

“Right on the ten-minute headway, Delegate Villa,” I whispered back with a smile as I flipped down my lap tray, opened my laptop, plugged my headphones into the assistive-listening audio jack at the side rail, and launched my digital capture software hooked into the chamber’s fixed legislative webcast camera.

Looking across the wide expanse of green carpet under the tall cream-and-gold coffered ceiling and crystal chandeliers of the House Chamber, I had a clear, floor-level view of the Speaker’s high marble rostrum at the front of the room, the Clerk’s well, the red-and-green electronic voting boards flanking the front wall, and Katie sitting upright in her compact SwiftChair at her accessible desk across the chamber on the minority aisle, her yellow-highlighted copy of House Bill 663 resting squarely in front of her desk microphone.

Thursday, February 4, 2016, 12:18 PM — Watching Across the House Floor as Katie Challenges the Patron

At twelve o’clock noon on the dot, the Speaker of the House rapped his wooden gavel against the rostrum block.

Up in the third-floor public gallery overhanging the rear wall—where two dozen college students from Virginia Dominion University and Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute, a handful of off-duty teachers, and several parents sat along the wooden benches—and down across the hundred mahogany desks on the Floor, everyone fell silent for the opening prayer, the Pledge of Allegiance, and the routine morning leaves of absence.

By 12:18 PM, the House had moved into the Second Reading calendar of bills reported out of committee. Half the Delegates on the floor were leaning back in their leather swivel chairs chatting with deskmates or flipping through binders while the Clerk read bill titles in a rapid, monotone cadence.

“House Bill 663, a bill to amend the Code of Virginia relating to single-gender public restrooms and facilities in buildings owned or leased by the Commonwealth, public institutions of higher education, and local school divisions; civil penalty. Patron, Delegate Cobb.”

From my wheelchair bay beside the outer right aisle, I clicked the red Record button on my laptop capture window and checked my audio level meters. Right in front of me, I saw Delegate Ronald Villa—a pragmatic coastal Virginia Beach Republican who cared about bus shelters, military families, and Oceanfront tourism, not culture-war stunts—let out a quiet sigh and rub his forehead as the bill was called.

Three rows ahead on the majority side of the House Floor, Delegate Martin Cobb—with his chief co-patron, Delegate Robert Marsh, seated two desks over—stood up behind his mahogany desk, buttoned his navy suit jacket, and leaned into his silver gooseneck microphone.

“Mr. Speaker and members of the House,” Delegate Cobb’s voice echoed across the chamber and came cleanly through my floor headphones, “House Bill 663 is a simple, common-sense measure to protect personal privacy and public safety across the Commonwealth of Virginia. This legislation directs the Department of General Services, every public institution of higher education, and every local school board to ensure that every single-gender public restroom, locker room, and shower facility in any public building or school is used exclusively by individuals whose anatomical sex matches the designated gender on the door—backed by a fifty-dollar civil penalty enforceable by law enforcement summons. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to engross the bill and advance it to its third reading.”

Across the chamber at the end of the minority aisle, I saw Katie press the white request-to-speak button on her desk console and raise her right hand into the air.

Up on the high marble rostrum, the Speaker glanced down toward the left aisle.

“For what purpose does the gentlewoman from Virginia Beach, Delegate Prairie, rise?” the Speaker asked into his microphone.

Across the green carpet, Katie flipped the toggle switch at the base of her desk microphone so the green indicator ring illuminated, and lifted the two printed pages of House Bill 663 in her right hand.

“Mr. Speaker, to see if the gentleman from Spotsylvania will yield for a question on the bill,” Katie’s voice rang out crisp and clear across the chamber.

“Does the gentleman from Spotsylvania yield to the gentlewoman from Virginia Beach?” the Speaker asked.

Standing at his desk across the center aisle, Delegate Cobb gave a brief, stiff nod. “I yield for a question, Mr. Speaker.”

“The gentleman yields,” the Speaker said.

From my wheelchair on the far side of the floor, I watched my twin sister look straight across the House Chamber at the bill’s patron.

“Thank you, Mr. Speaker,” Katie said. “Look with me for a moment at the exact text printed in House Bill 663, Delegate Cobb. My brother and I write computer software for a living, and when you write code—or when you write a state law—definitions determine how an instruction actually executes in the real world. Unlike bills that reference a birth certificate or a state identification card, your Line 18 on Page 1 explicitly defines anatomical sex as ‘the physical condition of being male or female, which is determined by a person’s anatomy.’ Not their driver’s license. Not how they are dressed. Their physical anatomy. And then on Page 2, Line 54, you mandate that a law enforcement officer issue a fifty-dollar civil summons at the restroom door based on that physical anatomy."

Across the floor around me, the background murmur of side conversations suddenly died down. Delegates who had been thumbing through their afternoon calendars looked up from their desks.

"The language of the bill speaks for itself, Mr. Speaker," Delegate Cobb replied stiffly into his desk microphone. "Restrooms in state buildings, public colleges, and public schools will be restricted strictly by anatomical sex, and law enforcement officers are authorized to issue a fifty-dollar civil summons to anyone who enters a restroom that does not match their anatomical sex."

Up at the front row of the center aisle, I saw Deputy Majority Leader Todd Gentry lean sharply across the mahogany divider toward House Majority Leader Richard Callaway's desk. Even from my wheelchair bay along the right rail, I could read the urgent tension in Gentry's posture as he whispered, "Richard, Prairie's gutting the bill. Are you going to do something?"

Majority Leader Callaway didn't even look up from the two-page printout of House Bill 663 resting on his leather blotter. "Like what?"

"Stop her!" Gentry hissed under his breath. "Look what she's doing to Cobb."

"She's asking him how his bill works," the Majority Leader murmured dryly, turning Page 1 over to Page 2 with two fingers. "She's reading the bill. And Cobb seems to be doing an adequate job of gutting it himself."

Over at her accessible desk on the far left aisle, Katie released her joystick brake half an inch, rolling her compact SwiftChair flush against the mahogany desk edge as she held the two printed pages of House Bill 663 high in the air. Across the chamber, I could hear the raw, unmistakable fire rising in my sister's voice.

"Mr. Speaker, when the people of Kempsville and Virginia Beach first elected me to serve in this House of Delegates two years ago," Katie declared, her voice echoing off the marble walls of the Capitol chamber, "I had to fight the facilities bureaucracy in this very Capitol complex just to get an ADA-compliant restroom stall wide enough for my power wheelchair to turn around in and close the door in privacy! Every single day of my life since I was sixteen years old, I have known what it feels like to have strangers stare at my body and treat a basic human necessity like using a public restroom as a public spectacle. And now the gentleman comes onto the Floor of this House with House Bill 663 and tells the women and girls of Virginia that the state government is going to police 'anatomical sex' at the door of every ladies' room from Virginia Beach to Blacksburg for a fifty-dollar fine!"

Up in the third-floor public gallery above us, the college students and parents leaned forward over the brass balcony rail, holding their breath. Down on the House Floor, you could have heard a pin drop.

"Then if the gentleman says there will be no physical inspection, how does the Commonwealth establish that someone's anatomical sex does not match the designation of the facility?" Katie demanded, shaking the printed pages of House Bill 663 across the aisle. "How, exactly, is a police officer or a state building inspector standing outside a restroom door at the Community College of Hampton Roads, or Virginia Dominion University, or right outside in this State Capitol corridor supposed to verify a citizen's 'physical anatomy' before writing your fifty-dollar ticket? If I am accused of being in the wrong women's restroom, what am I supposed to show somebody to prove that I'm female? I return to the exact question a thirteen-year-old girl asked me twenty minutes ago when she read your bill: why on earth should I—or any girl or woman in the Commonwealth of Virginia—have to pull my pants down for a government official or a police officer to prove I have female parts just to use the ladies' room?!"

An audible gasp swept across the chamber, followed half a second later by a sudden burst of applause from the visitors up in the third-floor gallery benches and several sharp "Hear, hear!" calls from the minority desks down on the Floor. Right beside my wheelchair on the Republican side of the floor, Delegate Ronald Villa winced, shook his head at Cobb's bill, and exchanged an unmistakable she's got him dead to rights look with his seatmate.

And up at the front row of the center aisle, at the words a thirteen-year-old girl asked me twenty minutes ago when she read your bill, I saw House Majority Leader Richard Callaway freeze for half a second and turn his head to look straight back at thirteen-year-old Sarah Hawkins standing at attention in her navy blue House Page blazer behind his desk.

Sarah looked right back at the Majority Leader and gave a single, solemn nod.

Even from across the green carpet, you could practically see the oh, for heaven's sake—one of my thirteen-year-old Pages found the hole in this bill realization cross the Majority Leader's face.

Bam! Bam!

"The House will come to order! The House will be in order!" Speaker William J. Harwell barked from the marble rostrum, pounding his wooden gavel twice as he looked up toward the third-floor balcony. "The guests in the public gallery are reminded that demonstrations of approval or disapproval are strictly prohibited by the rules of the House!"

Down on the Republican benches two seats over from Delegate Cobb, the bill's chief co-patron, Delegate Robert Marsh, shot to his feet with his face flushed crimson, stabbing a finger toward his microphone button. "Mr. Speaker! Point of order! The gentlewoman from Virginia Beach is using indecorous language on the floor of this House!"

Before the Speaker could rule—and before Democratic Minority Leader Tom Toscano could even rise from the front row of the left aisle—the Republican Majority Leader himself stood up behind his center-aisle desk.

"Mr. Speaker," Majority Leader Callaway called out calmly.

Up on the rostrum, Speaker Harwell paused with his gavel in hand. "The Majority Leader."

Richard Callaway looked once at Delegate Marsh and Delegate Cobb, and then straight up at the rostrum. "Mr. Speaker, the Gentlewoman's phrasing may be uncomfortable, but the Gentlewoman didn't introduce anatomy into this legislation.

The bill did. The legislation before us expressly makes anatomical sex determinative. I believe she is entitled to ask the patron how the Commonwealth proposes to determine that fact."

A stunned hush fell over all one hundred desks in the chamber.

Across the green carpet, Katie looked at the Republican Majority Leader in quiet amazement—remembering a sentence she would never forget for the rest of her life—before turning her eyes back to the bill's patron.

Out on the majority aisle of the House Floor, Delegate Martin Cobb stood completely frozen behind his desk microphone for four full seconds, his face turning beet-red under the chamber chandeliers as he looked from Katie's power wheelchair to the uneasy, downward stares of his own party colleagues around him.

"I—Mr. Speaker, the bill does not—nobody is suggesting—" Delegate Cobb stammered into his microphone, shuffling his folder on his desk without answering the question.

"Mr. Speaker, that is literally what the words printed on Page 1 and Page 2 of House Bill 663 require!" Katie replied from her SwiftChair, her voice steady, clear, and unflinching across the silent chamber. "Transgender women are women, transgender men are men, and every citizen in this Commonwealth deserves basic human dignity and privacy without politicians stationing bathroom police at the door to inspect people's anatomy. No woman or girl in Virginia should ever have to pull her pants down to prove she has female parts just to use a public restroom!"

Along the Republican rows from Hampton Roads to the Northern Virginia suburbs, I saw half a dozen moderate delegates—starting with Delegate Ronald Villa right beside my wheelchair and Appropriations Chairman S. Christopher Jennings two rows ahead—emphatically shaking their heads at Majority Whip Jackson Milligan. Milligan hurried up the center carpet and leaned down beside the Majority Leader's ear.

"Leader, we're bleeding votes," the Majority Whip murmured urgently.

"How badly?" Richard asked under his breath.

"Badly."

Majority Leader Richard closed his leather binder with a quiet snap, stood up at his front-row desk, and flipped on his microphone. "Pass it by."

"Mr. Speaker," the Majority Leader announced briskly across the chamber, "I move that House Bill 663 be passed by for the day."

"Without objection, House Bill 663 is passed by for the day," Speaker Harwell announced immediately, rapping his gavel once and hurrying straight ahead. "The Clerk will read the next bill on the calendar."

Thursday, February 4, 2016, 12:35 PM — Archiving the 95-Second Clip, “Your Bill Killed Your Bill,” & Rolling Back Through the Tunnel

In my wheelchair bay beside Delegate Villa’s desk, I clicked the Stop button on my capture window and exhaled a quiet breath.

Delegate Villa leaned slightly toward my armrest and whispered out of the corner of his mouth, “Your sister just drove a freight truck straight through the middle of that bill, Nate.”

I gave him a quiet grin and looked down at the timeline bar on my laptop screen while the Clerk moved on to a routine highway-naming bill. Checking the timestamp on the video file I had just recorded from the chamber feed, I saw that the entire floor exchange between Katie and Delegate Cobb ran ninety-five seconds.

Just like I did whenever Katie spoke on a bill on the House Floor, I opened Quantum Code right there on my lap tray, typed out a verbatim, frame-accurate WebVTT closed-caption file for the ninety-five-second video, burned high-contrast open captions along the bottom of the frame so constituents watching on mute could read every word, and uploaded the clip to Katie’s legislative website archive, StreamTube, and The Grid at 12:35 PM with a standard archival heading:

> Delegate Katie Prairie (D-Virginia Beach) Questions HB 663 Patron on the House Floor Regarding “Anatomical Sex” Restroom Enforcement (Feb. 4, 2016)

Twenty-five minutes later, at one o’clock, the House adjourned its Thursday floor session so members could grab lunch before afternoon committee work.

I unplugged my audio cable from the side rail, packed my laptop and capture rig back into my bag, shook Delegate Villa’s hand, and eased my joystick forward to roll toward the right-hand chamber doorway.

Right near the front of the aisle by the Clerk’s well—where Speaker William J. Harwell had just stepped down from the marble rostrum to confer with House Majority Leader Richard Callaway while thirteen-year-old House Page triplets Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins stood dutifully at attention behind the Majority Leader’s desk holding stacks of committee folders—a red-faced Delegate Martin Cobb marched up to the Majority Leader with his copy of House Bill 663 crumpled in his fist.

As I slowed my SwiftChair behind a cluster of departing delegates waiting for the doorway to clear, I heard every word.

“Leader, Prairie ambushed me out there!” Delegate Cobb complained bitterly. “Prairie killed my bill!”

Majority Leader Callaway stopped buttoning his suit coat and looked at the Gentleman from Spotsylvania over the top of his reading glasses.

“No,” Richard said flatly.

“Leader, you heard what she did on the floor!”

“I certainly did,” the Majority Leader replied in his calm, unhurried Danville baritone. “Katie asked how your bill worked.”

For two full seconds, nobody around the Clerk’s well made a sound.

“Your bill killed your bill, Martin,” Richard told him evenly. “And for your information, Sarah found this.”

Delegate Cobb blinked past the Majority Leader’s shoulder at thirteen-year-old Sarah Hawkins standing in her navy blue House Page blazer. “Leader…”

“Sarah is thirteen,” Richard said flatly.

“I understand that.”

“Apparently she understood the bill,” the Majority Leader replied dryly. “You brought a statute onto the House calendar whose central operative concept collapses under the very first implementation question. Supporters will always tell you why your bill is wonderful; opponents will tell you where it breaks. You should’ve put this bill in front of Katie before it ever left committee.”

Delegate Cobb stared at him as if the Majority Leader had lost his mind. “Prairie would’ve opposed it!”

“Of course she would’ve opposed it,” Richard replied. “That’s why you should’ve put it in front of her. Give your bill to the smartest person you know who’s determined to kill it. If it survives her, you might have something.”

Richard glanced half an inch over his shoulder toward the three eighth-grade Pages standing behind his desk.

“Better yet,” the Majority Leader added dryly, “you should’ve given it to Katie and those three Pages who follow her around.”

Cobb blinked at the three teenagers in their navy blue Page blazers. “Sam, Mandy, and Sarah?”

“Yes.”

“They’re thirteen.”

“And apparently none of the four of them were going to let you get away with an undefined enforcement mechanism,” Richard said.

Beside the Clerk’s desk, Speaker Harwell looked from the crumpled printout of House Bill 663 to the three eighth-graders in quiet disbelief. “Three thirteen-year-olds caught this?”

Standing between her brother and her twin sister, thirteen-year-old Sarah nodded solemnly. “We caught it really fast, Mr. Speaker.”

Right behind the Majority Leader’s back, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah clamped their lips tightly together, their shoulders twitching in unison as all three of them tried desperately not to laugh out loud on the House Floor.

Without even turning his head around, the Majority Leader caught them in the reflection of the brass rail.

“And don’t you three start,” Richard muttered—though I could see the corner of his mouth twitching as a thoroughly chastened Delegate Cobb turned on his heel and stalked out the side door.

Speaker Harwell let out a long breath, shook his head, and murmured to his floor leader, “Next time somebody brings us a bill about people’s anatomy, Richard, have Prairie read it first.”

“Actually, Mr. Speaker,” Majority Leader Callaway sighed, rubbing the bridge of his nose as he tucked his binder under his arm, “never bring a bill to this floor that failed Prairie—and have those three read it too.”

Biting the inside of my cheek to keep from grinning from ear to ear, I rolled out the right-hand chamber doorway into the first-floor marble corridor just as Katie came rolling out the left-hand doorway in her SwiftChair.

“Hey,” I said, rolling right up beside her and reaching out to take her left hand. “The ninety-five-second floor clip is captioned and archived on your constituent page—and wait until I tell you what the Majority Leader and the Speaker just told Delegate Cobb by the Clerk’s well. First, when you mentioned on the floor that a thirteen-year-old girl asked you that question twenty minutes ago, the Majority Leader turned right around and looked at Sarah standing behind his desk, and Sarah nodded right back at him! Then when Marsh tried to call you out of order, the Majority Leader stood up and told the whole House that you didn’t introduce anatomy into the legislation, the bill did. And when Cobb complained after the gavel that you killed his bill, the Majority Leader looked him dead in the eye and told him, ‘No, Katie asked how your bill worked—your bill killed your bill, and Sarah found this,’ while Sarah told the Speaker, ‘We caught it really fast!’ The Majority Leader said next time Cobb should have you and Sam, Mandy, and Sarah proofread his legislation before bringing it to the floor!”

Katie’s blue eyes lit up with a mixture of surprise, warmth, and quiet respect as she squeezed my fingers and we turned our wheelchairs side by side toward the elevator down to the underground Capitol tunnel. “Looks like Sarah, Mandy, Sam, and I just became the unofficial House Quality Assurance Department. Even if we sit on opposite sides of the aisle on almost everything else, at least the Majority Leader actually reads the bills. Come on—let’s go grab a sandwich in the basement cafeteria before our two o’clock Transit Legislative Day meetings.”

Part 2: Transit Legislative Day with Michael & Rachel, Two Meltdowns in Room 518, & The 6:05 AM Train to Meet the Nation

Date: 2016-02-04 at 14:15 America/New_York

Thursday, February 4, 2016, 2:15 PM — Virginia Transit Legislative Day in Room 518 & A Visit from Michael and Rachel Ragsdale

Out of all sixty days of the winter session in Richmond, Thursday, February fourth was the day on the legislative calendar that Katie and I looked forward to the most: Virginia Transit Legislative Day.

On almost every other afternoon of the session, the marble corridors of the General Assembly Building were packed wall-to-wall with corporate lobbyists in thousand-dollar tailored suits. On Transit Legislative Day, however, bus and rail riders from every corner of the Commonwealth rode charter coaches, intercity trains, and JRTC buses up to Capitol Square wearing bright blue RIDE TRANSIT VIRGINIA lapel stickers to lobby their Delegates and State Senators for state public transportation operating and capital dollars.

At two-fifteen that afternoon inside our fifth-floor office in Room 518, right after Katie and I finished reviewing the Hampton Roads transit allocation table with a group of bus operators from Newport News, two very familiar voices called out from our open doorway.

“Permission to roll into the bus delegate’s office?”

Katie and I looked up from our desks and broke into wide grins at the exact same second.

Rolling through the doorway in a folded-frame, blue-upholstered manual wheelchair was our twenty-eight-year-old childhood friend and former across-the-hall neighbor Michael Ragsdale, with his twenty-six-year-old sister Rachel walking right beside him in her glasses and royal-blue Virginia Dominion University jacket, keeping one hand resting lightly on his left rear push-handle and her other hand laced tightly through his fingers. Both of them had blue RIDE TRANSIT VIRGINIA stickers pressed over their hearts and carried folders of Coastal Virginia Transit Authority route maps.

“Michael! Rachel!” Katie beamed, nudging her joystick and rolling her SwiftChair out from behind her mahogany desk as I wheeled right up beside her so the four of us could exchange warm hugs across our armrests. “What are you two doing up in Richmond? And Michael, what happened to your ankles?”

“Elective bilateral Achilles heel cord lengthening two weeks ago,” Michael smiled, patting the frame of his blue manual wheelchair while never letting go of Rachel’s hand. “My heel cords have been too tight to pivot safely between driving pedals my whole life, and Rachel stubbornly refused to get her Learner’s Permit until we could walk into the DMV and get our permits together once my surgeon clears me. I can stand and walk short flat distances, but for a full day of marble Capitol hallways, my orthopedic specialist ordered me to use the manual chair and let my Bug guard the push-handles.”

“And we came up on the Hampton Roads transit advocacy bus this morning for Transit Legislative Day,” Rachel added proudly, adjusting her glasses with a grin. “Technically, our family home on Moosewood Drive is just across the district line in the Eighty-First District, and our campus apartment at VDU is in Norfolk’s Eighty-Ninth, so you aren’t officially our Delegate on our voter registration cards—but when there’s a Virginia Beach Delegate in the General Assembly who actually rides CVTA buses every day and knows the Route 25 and Route 2 timetables by heart, she’s our Delegate too! After we finished lobbying our assigned offices for evening bus frequency and Sunday service hours, there was no way we were leaving Richmond without coming up to the fifth floor to see our old Delaney Street and Greenway Court neighbors.”

“Wait—were the two of you up in the third-floor House gallery at noon today?” I asked, spotting the green visitor gallery passes tucked into their lanyards.

“Front row center, right behind the brass rail!” Michael laughed, his eyes lighting up. “Katie, watching you hold up the text of House Bill 663 and ask Delegate Cobb why any woman in Virginia should have to pull her pants down for a government official to prove she has female parts just to use the ladies’ room was the greatest thing I have ever seen in a government building. Nate, the second you posted the captioned video link at twelve-thirty-five, Rachel and I sent it to every student group chat at VDU and CCHR.”

“And tell them what you promised yourself in the hallway afterward, Bear,” Rachel said, nudging his shoulder with a laugh.

Michael grinned sheepishly from his blue manual wheelchair. “When we took the elevator downstairs after the floor session let out for lunch, I was still so fired up about that ridiculous bill that I made a solemn promise to myself and Rachel: if I saw Delegate Cobb—or Delegate Robert Marsh, who keeps talking to reporters about bringing his own bathroom bill—heading toward the men’s room anywhere in the General Assembly Building while we were making our Transit Legislative Day rounds, I was going to wheel right up to the bathroom door and demand that he pull his pants down right there in the corridor to prove he had male parts!”

Katie clapped both hands over her mouth as she and I burst out laughing together across our armrests.

“Did you see either of them?” I asked through my laughter.

“Sadly, no,” Michael sighed, shaking his head with mock disappointment. “Neither of them crossed our path all afternoon, so I never got the chance—Wait until he sees how fast that video is spreading across VDU right now, though. By Monday morning, neither of those guys is going to want to show his face near a microphone.”

After spending twenty wonderful minutes catching up on CVTA bus routes, our old first-floor hallway on Greenway Court, and their computer information systems classes at VDU, we rolled alongside Michael and Rachel out to the fifth-floor elevators so they could catch their late-afternoon transit coalition bus back down Interstate 64 to Hampton Roads.

Right as the elevator doors opened for Michael and Rachel at two-forty, an entire New River Valley transit delegation wearing blue RIDE TRANSIT VIRGINIA stickers rolled off the elevator and into Room 518—three closely knit families from Christiansburg and Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute in Blacksburg who rode Blue Ridge Transit Route 1 and Route 2 and the Radford Connector around town, and who had been sitting in the third-floor House gallery right beside Michael and Rachel when Katie questioned Delegate Cobb on House Bill 663.

Rolling in first was Jordan in his power wheelchair alongside Aubrie Jean, Megan, Zoë, and Isabel, followed right beside them by Freddie in his matte-black titanium manual wheelchair, his sixteen-year-old sister Harper in her neon-purple wheelchair, and their sisters Paige, Jessica, Sarah, and Jenna, and right behind them came Ryan

O’Connell propelling his matte-black titanium manual wheelchair with his sister Cassidy holding onto his rear push-handles like a rolling walker alongside their youngest sister Holly and their twin cousins Evan and Tyler Wright.

“Four powerchairs and three ultralight manual chairs in one legislative office!” I grinned from beside my laptop as Katie and I wheeled our two black SwiftChairs out from behind her mahogany desk to form a wide semi-circle of seven wheelchairs in the center of Room 518. “Now this is what the General Assembly Building is supposed to look like on Transit Legislative Day—and wait a second, Katie, that’s Ryan, Cassidy, and Holly O’Connell and Evan and Tyler Wright of The Stardust Engine!”

Even though they lived up in Blacksburg and Christiansburg rather than in the Eighty-Fifth House District—though Aubrie Jean beamed as she told us she had grown up right across the city line from Kempsville in the Emerald Creek neighborhood of Chesapeake before heading to CPI, and Katie’s face lit up as she told Ryan and Cassidy that she and I listened to ‘Neon on the Huckleberry Trail’ while compiling bus timetables at night and admired how Ryan’s rear push-handles were set at the exact height for Cassidy to use as a rolling walker—every single one of them hated House Bill 663 just as fiercely as we did. Speaking through the voice synthesizer on his tablet, Jordan thanked Katie for standing up against a bill that would turn public restrooms into hostile fifty-dollar police checkpoints for wheelchair users and the family members who help them; Freddie, adjusting his glasses with Harper’s hand anchored firmly to his right sleeve and Paige’s hands resting on his shoulders, told Katie that her ninety-five-second floor cross-examination had exposed a fatal runtime error in Line 18 of Delegate Cobb’s statute; and Ryan and Holly thanked Katie on behalf of disabled travelers across the state and Engine Room Records. Before they headed back downstairs to return to Christiansburg and Progress Street NE in Blacksburg, Holly, Zoë, Aubrie Jean, Paige, and Jenna had already pulled out their tablets and phones and shared our captioned ninety-five-second floor video with every student organization, computer science mailing list, Engine Room Records channel, and transit group across Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute.

We spent the rest of the afternoon until five-thirty meeting with special-education parents from Virginia Beach and reviewing coastal flooding amendments with our legislative aide, with both of our laptops closed on our desks.

Thursday, February 4, 2016, 6:00 PM — The Evening News in Richmond and Norfolk

“Hand me the pepper shaker, Nate,” Katie said at six o’clock that Thursday evening, setting two warm plates of baked chicken and rice down on the dining table of Apartment 104 at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts on West Broad Street after we had ridden the 5:35 PM westbound JRTC Route 6 bus home from Ninth and Broad. “And turn on the television so we can see the weather forecast for the weekend.”

Picking up the remote control from the corner of the table, I clicked on the wall-mounted television—tuned first to the Richmond local six-o’clock news broadcast, with my laptop open beside my glass of ginger ale streaming our hometown six-o’clock broadcast from Norfolk so we could keep up with Hampton Roads news while we were in Richmond for the winter session.

I barely had time to set the remote down before both my twin sister and I froze with our forks halfway to our mouths.

On the television screen on the wall—and simultaneously on the Norfolk local news stream playing on my laptop—was the exact ninety-five-second video clip I had captured from my wheelchair bay on the House Floor at lunchtime.

"—and our top story from the State Capitol tonight," the Richmond evening anchor announced over the footage of Katie sitting upright in her compact SwiftChair on the House Floor holding up the two printed pages of House Bill 663, "a fiery floor exchange in the House of Delegates this afternoon over House Bill 663, the controversial bathroom bill restricting public restrooms by 'anatomical sex,' after Virginia Beach Delegate Katie Prairie brought the House Chamber to a standstill with a single question for the bill's patron."

Before our eyes, both the Richmond station and the Norfolk station aired the floor clip in full—every word of Katie asking Delegate Martin Cobb why she, or any woman or girl in the Commonwealth of Virginia, should have to pull her pants down for a government official or a police officer to prove she had female parts just to use the ladies' room, followed by the four seconds of Delegate Cobb standing frozen and beet-red behind his desk microphone before the Majority Leader hurriedly passed the bill by for the day.

Katie stared at the television screen, her blue eyes wide. "Nate… they're playing the whole floor clip on the six-o'clock news. In Richmond and back home in Norfolk."

I reached over and woke my laptop browser window, refreshing the server dashboard for Katie's legislative archive and The Grid.

My jaw dropped.

"Michael and Rachel weren't kidding when they said they shared your clip with everyone at VDU and CCHR!" I said, turning the laptop screen toward her wheelchair. "Look at the traffic logs! Between the Transit Legislative Day riders sharing your link from the Capitol and the beat reporters from the Richmond and Norfolk papers embedding your captioned video on their blogs at two-thirty while we were in meetings, thousands of office workers and college students at Virginia Dominion University, CCHR, and Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute watched it on their phones all afternoon. That's how the assignment desks at the Richmond and Norfolk TV stations grabbed it for the six-o'clock news!"

Friday, February 5, 2016, 9:15 AM — The Speakerphone Call on Line One, Two Twin Meltdowns, & The Majority Leader's Triplets

The black multi-line telephone on Katie's desk in our fifth-floor General Assembly Building office rang once on Line One at nine-fifteen on Friday morning, and just as she had done ever since her very first week on the Virginia Beach City Council, Katie reached over from her SwiftChair to press the speakerphone button herself.

In almost every other legislative office in the Capitol complex, a constitutional officer never picked up their own main telephone line; incoming calls were strictly screened by a legislative aide or session receptionist at the front desk so the member wouldn't be interrupted by cold calls. Teaching Katie to let a ringing phone go unanswered when she was sitting right beside it, however, was impossible. In Katie's literal autistic mind, Room 518 was her office, her name was on the brass plate outside the door, and if she was at her desk with a free hand, the polite, honest thing to do was answer the phone herself so the constituent on the other end knew she was actually there working for them. At this point in our time in Richmond—and certainly up in Washington—people outside Virginia Beach were still learning that Katie answered her own phone directly, and as she pressed the button, she fully expected the caller to be a retired shipyard worker from Kempsville reporting a missed CVTA bus connection on Princess Anne Road.

"Delegate Katie Prairie's office, this is Katie speaking," she said, keeping one hand resting on her open municipal transit binder while I sat right beside her left wheel with my silver MagnaBook Pro laptop open on the side table.

There was a brief, startled pause on the other end of the speakerphone. "Oh! Good morning, Delegate Prairie—is this really Delegate Prairie herself? I honestly expected your front-desk scheduler or a legislative assistant to pick up the main switchboard line. My name is Arthur Vance, and I'm a senior producer for Meet the Nation at GBS News up here in Washington. I hope I'm not catching you at a bad time?"

Katie blinked, glancing sideways at me in surprise. To the two of us, Meet the Nation was the quiet Sunday morning news program our dad David used to put on the living room television in Virginia Beach while the three of us ate scrambled eggs and toast together.

"Not at all, Mr. Vance," Katie said politely. "My brother Nate and I were just looking over some bus shelter amendments. How can I help you?"

"Well, Delegate, David Vance and our editorial team here in Washington watched your exchange on the House Floor yesterday afternoon over House Bill 663," Mr. Vance said warmly, his voice remarkably courteous and unhurried. "You raised some serious constitutional questions about how a law like that could ever be enforced in public buildings without violating the Fourth Amendment. David would be honored if you would join him this Sunday morning at nine o'clock for a quiet, one-on-one conversation to walk through the text of the bill—if you'd be willing to make it a Sunday morning exclusive with Meet the Nation."

Katie's shoulders visibly relaxed in her SwiftChair. After answering questions from the local Richmond and Norfolk newspaper reporters the evening before, the word exclusive sounded like a wonderful relief to her: it meant she would only have to put on a stiff blazer, sit under bright lights, state the literal facts of House Bill 663 one time, and then go straight back to our apartment in Richmond without having to repeat the exact same sentences to anyone else.

"Do you mean if I talk to Mr. Vance at nine o'clock on Sunday morning, I only have to tell the story one time and nobody else will ask me to repeat it all afternoon?" Katie asked literally.

On the speakerphone, Arthur Vance let out a soft, warm laugh. "That is the exact agreement, Delegate Prairie. Just you and David Vance one-on-one at nine o'clock sharp, zero cross-talk, and you're completely done by nine-twenty. We would be happy to send a car down to your address in Richmond at five-thirty Sunday morning to drive you up Interstate 95—"

“Oh, you don’t need to waste money on a car, Mr. Vance,” Katie said right away. “My brother Nate and I always ride public transit and pay our own regular fare, and a car would just get stuck in traffic on the 14th Street Bridge anyway. The suburban Staples Mill station doesn’t have Sunday bus service yet, so we’ll take the early JRTC bus down Broad Street to Richmond Main Street Station, ride the six-oh-five ARTS Northeast Regional train up to Alexandria, and use our blue CapitalPass cards from our family trips with our dad to take the Capital Transit Yellow Line across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge into L’Enfant Plaza, and then transfer to the Route P6 bus across the National Mall right to your door on North Capitol Street. We’ll be at your studio desk by eight-thirty—and then we can catch the eleven-twelve train out of Alexandria with the connecting ARTS Thruway shuttle back to Main Street Station so I can get back to our apartment and out of my dress blazer by two o’clock.”

“You two are taking a Richmond city bus, an intercity train, the Yellow Line subway across the Potomac, and a D.C. bus across the National Mall?” Mr. Vance asked, sounding genuinely charmed. “Well, whatever makes you most comfortable, Delegate. We’ll have two security passes waiting for you and your brother at the Washington bureau front desk at eight-thirty Sunday morning. Thank you so much for giving us your word.”

“Thank you for being so polite, Mr. Vance,” Katie said, and pressed the button to end the call.

Only as the speakerphone clicked off at nine-twenty-two did Katie and I look down at the plastic telephone console on her desk.

While we had been talking cleanly on Line One for the last four minutes, the little red hold lights on Line Two, Line Three, Line Four, and Line Five had all started blinking furiously at the exact same time, though the ringer had been automatically muted while the speakerphone was active.

Before I could even ask Katie why the whole console was lit up like a Christmas tree, our office door flew open. Katie’s twenty-four-year-old legislative aide stumbled in carrying a thick stack of pink paper message slips, followed two seconds later by Greg, the Communications Director for the Virginia House Democratic Caucus, who was holding two vibrating cell phones in his hands and breathing like he had just sprinted all the way up the stairs from the third floor.

“Katie! Do not touch that phone until I clear a schedule!” Greg gasped, leaning over the front edge of her desk. “Capitol Sunday is holding on Line Two, This Sunday is on Line Three, Beltway Sunday is on Line Four, and the cable networks are blowing up my cell phone! They all want to book you for Sunday morning! We can set up a full Sunday morning sweep right now—four television shows back-to-back from eight in the morning until noon—”

“Oh, no thank you,” Katie said calmly, shaking her head. “I would hate sitting in a stiff blazer repeating the exact same story four times in a row. Besides, I already promised Mr. Vance on Line One that I would only talk to Meet the Nation.”

The room went dead silent.

Greg stared down at Katie, then over at my wheelchair, his mouth opening and closing without a sound.

“You… you answered your own phone and promised an exclusive to Meet the Nation without talking to me first?” he whispered, his face flushing red.

I looked up from my laptop keyboard, confused by his sudden anger. “Mr. Vance called while we were looking at CVTA bus stops. He was the first one to ask, he was very polite to Katie, and he told her that if she goes on at nine o’clock, she only has to explain the bill once and then we can catch the eleven-twelve train out of Alexandria and come home.”

“Yeah,” Katie agreed simply. “Why would I want to go on four television shows on a Sunday morning when I can explain the statute once at nine o’clock and be back in our apartment in sweatpants by two in the afternoon?”

Greg slowly lowered both of his ringing cell phones to his sides, staring at the two of us with his jaw clenched. “I have to go tell the other three networks you’re off the board,” he muttered tightly, backing out of our office doorway into the outer reception room.

As he pulled the heavy oak door behind him, the latch didn’t quite catch, leaving a two-inch gap between the frame and the jamb.

Through that crack, Katie and I heard every single word as Greg snatched up the blinking phones at the legislative aide’s desk in the outer room and started barking into the handsets back-to-back.

“Look, Sarah, I’m telling you, I can’t put her on Capitol Sunday!” we heard him shout into Line Two, his voice loud and exasperated. “She’s a backbench delegate from Virginia Beach who has never dealt with national press in her life! She picked up her own main office line five minutes ago before my staff could even get up the stairs and promised an exclusive to Meet the Nation! She had no idea what she was doing!”

Beside me, Katie’s hands froze on the edges of her transit binder.

Out in the reception room, Greg slammed down Line Two, punched Line Three, and started all over again. “No, I’m not freezing This Sunday out on purpose! Delegate Prairie doesn’t know how Washington booking rules work—she literally answered her own phone and gave away a Sunday morning exclusive without clearing it with Caucus Communications or the Minority Leader’s office! Now I have to go down to the third floor and explain to leadership and the entire Democratic Caucus what just happened!”

The outer hall door banged shut as he hurried down the corridor toward the stairs.

Inside Room 518, the silence felt suffocating.

I looked over at my twin sister, and my stomach dropped right through the floor. Katie’s fingers were trembling violently against the yellow highlighter in her lap, her breathing was coming in shallow, rapid gasps, and every trace of color had drained out of her face.

For two autistic twins who had spent our whole lives relying on literal written rules to survive, there was no phrase on earth more terrifying than unwritten rules. Whenever someone in authority started shouting about protocols that weren’t printed in any handbook—about failing to clear things with leadership or breaking rules nobody had ever told us existed—it sent every alarm bell in our nervous systems screaming at once.

"Nate…" Katie whispered, her voice shaking so badly she could barely get my name out as her chest began to heave. "Did I just break a House rule? Was I not allowed to talk to Mr. Vance on the telephone without asking the Caucus first?"

"I—I don't know, sis," I stammered, and the raw panic in my own voice immediately set off a feedback loop between the two of us. My own hands were shaking so hard on the keyboard of my laptop that I could barely click open the PDF of the Rules of the Virginia House of Delegates, my eyes darting frantically down the table of contents for anything about national television interviews or caucus clearance while Katie's breathing grew faster and louder beside me. "It's not in the written standing rules on my laptop, Katie, I swear it isn't, but the way Greg just ran downstairs to report you to the Minority Leader…"

Katie burst into tears, a full-blown autistic meltdown overtaking her as she buried her face in both hands and began sobbing and shaking from head to toe.

"What if they kick me out of the Caucus, Nate?!" Katie cried, gasping for air between sobs as her whole body trembled in her wheelchair. "What if I broke an ethics rule and they expel me from the House of Delegates?! All the voters in Virginia Beach trusted me, and Dad was so proud of us, and I ruined everything just because I answered the telephone!"

Seeing my twin sister in a full autistic meltdown—and spiraling straight into a sympathetic meltdown of my own as the terrifying thought seized my chest that Katie was really about to be kicked out of the House of Delegates because neither of us understood some secret Richmond rule—I released the electromagnetic brakes of my SwiftChair with a trembling hand, wheeled myself flush against the side of her chair, and wrapped both of my arms around her shoulders, hugging her as tight as I could across our armrests.

Katie pressed her wet face into the shoulder of my charcoal suit jacket, sobbing uncontrollably against my lapel while my own tears spilled hot down my cheeks. I held onto my sister with everything I had, resting my chin against the top of her blonde hair while my chest shook right alongside hers and my heart hammered at a hundred and thirty beats a minute.

Just then, out of the corner of Katie's tear-blurred eye—and mine—both of us saw three figures appear together in the open outer doorway of our fifth-floor reception room.

It was thirteen-year-old Sam Hawkins and his thirteen-year-old sisters, Amanda—who went by Mandy—and Sarah Hawkins: three eighth-grade triplets who were all serving together this session as middle-school House Pages. Sam was the fraternal triplet, born first, while Mandy and Sarah were identical twins, born second and third. All three of them wore the iconic daily uniform of a crisp navy blue House Page blazer with the official Virginia Page patch on the breast pocket, a brass House Page name badge reading HAWKINS, and a button-down shirt—Sam in gray slacks and a striped tie that looked almost identical to what I wore to work every day, and Mandy and Sarah in matching gray skirts and navy Page ties—with Sam clutching a stack of yellow transportation committee bill folders against his chest while Mandy and Sarah held onto either side of his blazer sleeve.

They were eighth-graders from down near Danville along the North Carolina line—the rural region everybody at the State Capitol called Southside Virginia. When Katie and I had first arrived in Richmond from Virginia Beach and Norfolk, we had been completely baffled whenever senior lawmakers referred to legislators from the Southside. Growing up on our side of the harbor, whenever Katie and I heard the word Southside, we automatically thought of Southside Hampton Roads—everything south of the Hampton Roads Bridge-Tunnel from Norfolk and Portsmouth out to Kempsville and the Oceanfront. It had actually been Sam, Mandy, and Sarah who politely explained to us during Page orientation week in January with a printed highway map of Route 58 that in Richmond Capitol politics, Southside meant the rural tobacco and textile counties stretching west from Emporia to Danville and Martinsville, well over a hundred miles inland from our coast.

Right after that map lesson during the first week of January—when the thirteen- and fourteen-year-old Pages were getting started learning how state government worked—an impatient senior legislator had barked three vague errands at the triplets at once in the noisy hallway outside the Clerk's office. At the sound of an adult shouting at them, all three thirteen-year-olds had frozen against the marble wall, clutching each other's hands so tightly their knuckles turned white as they trembled on the verge of a sensory and panic meltdown. Recognizing that look in an instant, Katie and I had rolled our two SwiftChairs right up in front of them to block the hallway foot traffic and give them a quiet protective perimeter. Speaking in a soft, calm voice, Katie had told Sam, Mandy, and Sarah that she and I were autistic too, and that just like the two of us were each other's safe person, we could tell the three of them were each other's safe person too.

All three triplets had looked up at Katie with wide, shining eyes and told her that all three of them were autistic as well. Ever since that afternoon, Katie had been Sam, Mandy, and Sarah's absolute favorite Delegate in the entire chamber. Whenever Katie pressed her Page Call button on the House Floor, all three of them practically sprinted together to her wheelchair bay—because Katie never shouted, never used sarcasm, never gave them conflicting tasks at once, and always wrote the exact room number and bill number clearly on a sticky note before thanking Sam, Mandy, and Sarah by name. Even more than that, after watching Katie and me famously ride the city bus down Broad Street every morning and take the intercity passenger train between Hampton Roads and Richmond, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah had decided that public transportation was the biggest issue they wanted to work on as House Pages—volunteering for every House Transportation Committee courier run and choosing statewide bus and passenger rail expansion as their Page legislative project.

Standing together in our fifth-floor doorway, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah froze in their tracks as they saw their favorite Delegate crying and shaking in her wheelchair. Their eyes went wide with alarm, Mandy and Sarah grabbed Sam's hands, and without a single word, all three triplets spun on their heels and took off running together down the hallway toward the elevators.

In our panic, watching even the three young House Pages bolt from our doorway only made us hold onto each other tighter, terrified that the entire Capitol was about to find out Katie had broken a rule and was being expelled.

Three minutes later, urgent footsteps echoed from both ends of the fifth-floor corridor at the exact same moment.

From the marble stairwell came Democratic House Minority Leader Tom Toscano with Greg trailing half a step behind him—and at the exact same second, the brass elevator doors down the hall chimed open and Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway came racing down the corridor right alongside thirteen-year-old Sam, Mandy, and Sarah.

“Right in here, Uncle Richard!” Sam panted outside our doorway, pointing straight toward our open inner door while Mandy and Sarah nodded urgently beside him.

“That press man in the outer office was yelling so loud about breaking an unwritten rule and reporting her,” Mandy said breathlessly, holding tight to Sarah’s hand, “and the Gentlewoman from Virginia Beach is in there crying in her wheelchair!”

Both the Democratic Minority Leader and the Republican Majority Leader reached our doorway at the same time and stopped dead in their tracks as they saw the two of us huddled together in our power wheelchairs—Katie sobbing into my shoulder in a full autistic meltdown, and me crying and shaking right along with her like I was trying to shield my twin sister from an oncoming train.

“Whoa, whoa, hold on a second,” the Minority Leader breathed, the color draining from his own face as he realized what had happened. He spun on his heel and shot a furious glare at the communications director—“Stay out here in the hall, Greg. Do not move a muscle”—before stepping quietly into Room 518 right alongside the Republican Majority Leader, with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah standing right between them clutching each other’s sleeves and the stack of yellow transportation committee bill folders.

The two floor leaders pulled the wooden guest chairs right up in front of our footrests so they were sitting side by side at eye level with us.

Katie lifted her tear-stained face an inch off my shoulder, gasping for breath and wiping furiously at her red eyes with the back of her trembling wrist as she tried to sit up in her chair.

“Mr. Minority Leader, Mr. Majority Leader, I am so sorry,” Katie choked out through her tears, her whole frame still shaking against my arms. “I didn’t know there was a rule that a delegate wasn’t allowed to answer Line One or agree to talk to a television show without asking the Caucus first! When Mr. Vance asked for an exclusive, I only said yes because we used to watch that show with our dad over breakfast and I thought it meant I could tell the story one time and come home on the eleven-twelve train! Please don’t kick me out of the House of Delegates—I’ll call him back right now and cancel it!”

“Please don’t expel her, sirs,” I pleaded, my own voice cracking as my hands shook on Katie’s shoulders. “I searched the whole House Manual on my laptop and we didn’t know—”

Both floor leaders looked at Katie and me, and their faces softened with deep, unmistakable gentleness.

“Expel her? Kicked out of the House?” the Democratic Minority Leader repeated softly, holding up both hands palm-out in a calm, steady gesture. “Katie, Nate—look at both of us. Take a slow breath. You are not getting kicked out of the House of Delegates, you are not getting kicked out of the Democratic Caucus, and you did not break a single rule. Not a written rule, and not an unwritten rule.”

Seeing Katie’s eyes still pink around the edges and my wheelchair parked tight against hers, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah stepped half a pace forward past their uncle toward Katie’s desk.

“Delegate Prairie?” Sam asked quietly, holding out the stack of yellow folders with both hands while Mandy and Sarah stood shoulder to shoulder with him. “We brought the morning transportation dockets you asked for on the sticky note. Are you and Nate okay?”

“When that man in the outer office started shouting that you broke an unwritten rule, we got really scared for you,” Sarah added in a small, earnest voice, her fingers laced through Mandy’s. “So the three of us ran right downstairs to get Uncle Richard.”

Katie blinked in astonishment at the words Uncle Richard, looking from the brass HAWKINS name badges on Sam, Mandy, and Sarah’s navy blazers up to the Republican Majority Leader before offering all three triplets a warm, steady smile and taking the folders gently from Sam’s hands to set them neatly on the corner of her blotter. “Thank you, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah. These are the exact bills I needed, and you three were right on time. Nate and I are okay now.”

The Republican Majority Leader rested his hands gently on the shoulders of his nephew and nieces, taking off his reading glasses and tucking them into his breast pocket as he looked at Katie and me with his warm Danville drawl.

“You two have been looking out for Sam, Mandy, and Sarah on the House Floor every single day since January,” Majority Leader Callaway said, his voice thick with genuine emotion. “Because I’m their maternal uncle—their mother’s brother—their Page badges say Hawkins while my desk plaque downstairs says Callaway, so neither of you had any way of knowing. My wife—their Aunt Marge Callaway—and I have custody of all three of them. We rescued these three kids and took them into our home about a year ago after the unspeakable things their mother and stepfather put them through.”

Inside Room 518, both Katie and I inhaled sharply, our hearts clenching as we looked at the three thirteen-year-old triplets clinging to each other’s hands beside their uncle—and in a single heartbeat, remembering our own mother Brenda and how our dad David had fought to rescue the two of us when we were sixteen, along with the awful year in our twenties when Katie’s controlling jerk of a boyfriend Brandon Mercer in Williamsburg and my manipulative girlfriend Tiffany Sloan had tried to tear us apart, we understood everything about why Sam, Mandy, and Sarah never let go of each other in the hallways.

“After what Sam, Mandy, and Sarah survived before Marge and I got them safe, they are each other’s safe person, and Marge and I don’t let anyone raise a hand or a voice to them ever again,” Uncle Richard continued quietly, drawing the three triplets close against his sides. “Out of all one hundred members of this House—including their own Uncle Richard—you are their absolute favorite Delegate in the entire building, and running errands for your desk is their favorite activity in the Capitol. Over dinner with their Aunt Marge and me on Sunday night, all three of them couldn't stop talking about how Delegate Prairie's wheelchair bay is the only spot on the carpet where nobody ever yells at them or barks confusing orders on the fly, and how much it meant to them when you shielded them in the hallway with your wheelchairs and told them that you and Nate were autistic too. So when Sam, Mandy, and Sarah come sprinting into my office telling me somebody is up on the fifth floor shouting about unwritten rules at their favorite delegate from the other Southside, that's my business too—party lines be damned."

Katie blinked, a tear of pure gratitude slipping down her cheek as a warm smile broke across her face, looking from Sam, Mandy, and Sarah up to the Majority Leader's eyes while the last trace of panic in my chest melted away completely.

"Now, you and I sit on opposite sides of that green carpet downstairs, Delegate, and lord knows you got my Republican caucus all up in arms yesterday afternoon over House Bill 663," the Majority Leader continued warmly. "That's just politics. We're going to disagree on plenty of votes while you're in Richmond. Personally, though? Marge and I like you a whole lot, Delegate Prairie, because of how kindly you treat Sam, Mandy, and Sarah every single day—and after Marge and I spent all month coaching these three through their Page Manual at our kitchen table, a staffer bullying you and your brother into an autistic meltdown over made-up unwritten rules is personal to me."

He pointed a finger toward the copy of the Manual of the House of Delegates sitting beside Katie's telephone.

"Here is the only rule you, Nate, and my three kids here ever need to know in the Capitol," the Majority Leader said firmly. "Every single unwritten rule you hear a staffer or a lobbyist holler about in the hallways of Richmond is completely made up. The only rules that govern this House are the Constitution of Virginia, the printed House Manual, and the Page Manual—and I know for a fact the five of you are the only people on this floor who have actually read every word of them."

Beside their uncle, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah nodded solemnly in unison.

"Page forty-two," Sam said clearly.

"It says a Delegate controls her own office communications at all times," Mandy added, looking straight at Katie.

"And it doesn't say a single word about asking a press guy first," Sarah finished.

Both the Democratic Minority Leader and the Republican Majority Leader burst out laughing, and Katie let out a bright, genuine laugh too, reaching over to give my forearm a squeeze.

"Sam, Mandy, and Sarah are better parliamentarians than half the lawyers on the Courts of Justice Committee," the Minority Leader chuckled, clapping a hand on his colleague's shoulder before reaching into his breast pocket and handing Katie a clean, folded white handkerchief. "And as for why Greg was losing his mind over your phone call, Katie, it's because neither of you saw what happened to your floor video overnight, did you? After the local stations in Richmond and Norfolk aired your question on the six-o'clock news last night, the national news desks in Washington and New York picked it up. Your ninety-five-second floor clip crossed ten million views across the United States before sunrise this morning."

Both Katie and I froze in our wheelchairs, staring at the two leaders with wide eyes. "Ten million?" I whispered.

"Ten million and climbing," the Minority Leader nodded warmly. "And what you did on the telephone ten minutes ago without even trying, Katie, is the single biggest triumph our Caucus has had in a decade. Meet the Nation isn't just a Sunday morning show—it is the most prestigious public affairs broadcast in the United States. Members of Congress in Washington spend ten years lobbying just to get invited onto that set. Every President, every U.S. Senator, every Governor, and every Fortune 500 CEO in America watches Meet the Nation at nine o'clock on Sunday morning. Because you picked up your own phone and politely agreed to give Arthur Vance an exclusive so you only had to tell your story once, he gave a Virginia Beach delegate the solo nine o'clock A-Block lead at the very top of the broadcast."

"Do you know how many sitting Governors and U.S. Senators in both parties would give their right arm to get invited onto the opening A-Block of Meet the Nation for a one-on-one exclusive with David Vance?" Majority Leader Callaway added with a chuckle. "Whenever some overcaffeinated press staffer starts hollering because you answered your own phone instead of playing Washington media games, you two didn't do a doggone thing wrong—he did. My job as Majority Leader is to help my caucus govern effectively, not assure our members that everything they write is brilliant. As I told the gentleman from Spotsylvania and Speaker Harwell right after the gavel yesterday—and as Sam, Mandy, and Sarah proudly informed Marge and me over supper last night after telling us how Sarah looked at Line 18 on your desk before noon and asked if somebody had to see her parts to prove she was a girl—you didn't kill his bill, Delegate. His bill killed his bill. Half my own caucus wishes he had put House Bill 663 through the Prairie-and-triplet quality-assurance test before he embarrassed the whole Commonwealth on television."

"Wait," I whispered, the vise around my ribs finally vanishing completely. "So when Greg went downstairs to tell the Caucus what Katie did…"

"We were cheering, Nate!" the Minority Leader smiled, standing up from his chair. "The only people upset this morning are the booking producers at the other three networks who called three minutes too late—and that's their problem, not yours. Now, if you will excuse me for sixty seconds, I'm going to step out into the hallway and make sure Greg understands how things work in this building."

"They take after their favorite delegate," the Majority Leader said, resting a proud hand on Sam, Mandy, and Sarah's shoulders and giving Katie a warm wink as he stood up beside the Minority Leader. "In fact, because the three of them know how famously you and Nate ride the bus and the train everywhere you go, they already told Marge and me that public transportation is the number-one issue they want to work on as House Pages—they've been drafting their Page Mock Session bill all week to connect rural Southside bus routes in Danville and Martinsville with the passenger trains to Richmond and Hampton Roads."

"Because everyone should be able to take a bus or a train wherever they need to go, just like you and Nate do, Delegate Prairie!" Mandy beamed, while Sam and Sarah nodded enthusiastically beside her.

“We’ll help you three check every schedule table in your bill on Monday afternoon,” Katie promised warmly, her eyes crinkling with genuine joy.

“And just so we’re clear on the bipartisan record,” the Majority Leader added with a kindly smile, “if you and Nate are taking the six-oh-five train out of Main Street Station on Sunday morning to go talk to David Vance on Meet the Nation, don’t let anyone in this building bother you all weekend. Safe travels across the Potomac, Delegate—and Marge, the kids, and I will all be watching you Sunday morning before we see you at noon on Monday to strike House Bill 663 off the calendar for good.”

As the two leaders turned toward the door, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah all gave Katie and me a bright, relieved wave together before stepping back out into the fifth-floor hallway beside their Uncle Richard.

Once the heavy oak door latched shut behind them—and while the marble acoustics of the corridor outside carried thirty seconds of the Minority Leader blistering Greg by the stairwell and ordering him to apologize to both Katie and me before noon—Katie looked over at me across our touching armrests inside our quiet office, the color completely back in her cheeks and her hands steady on the yellow transportation folders Sam, Mandy, and Sarah had delivered.

“Page forty-two,” Katie said softly, smiling as I pulled our bank card out of my wallet and clicked the final confirmation button on my laptop to lock in our two Business Class wheelchair bays on Sunday morning’s ARTS Northeast Regional Train 164 from Richmond Main Street Station to Alexandria, along with the eleven-twelve southbound return on Train 143 and its connecting ARTS Thruway 8443 shuttle. “A Delegate controls her own office communications at all times.”

Friday, February 5, 2016, 5:15 PM — Riding JRTC Route 6 to Dinner with Uncle Richard & The Triplets’ Transit Homework

“Wait up, Delegate Prairie! Wait for us!”

Katie and I had just rolled our SwiftChairs out the accessible ground-floor doors of the General Assembly Building onto the brick sidewalk at Ninth and Broad after the brief Friday afternoon floor session gaveled out for the weekend when three familiar voices called out behind us in the crisp February twilight.

Turning our chairs beside the glass-paneled JRTC bus shelter, we saw thirteen-year-old Sam, Mandy, and Sarah hurrying down the granite steps in their wool winter coats over their navy House Page blazers, holding onto each other’s hands—with the Republican House Majority Leader, their Uncle Richard, and a warm-faced woman in a camel-colored coat walking right behind them.

“Evening again, Delegate. Evening, Nate,” Uncle Richard chuckled, his breath misting in the forty-degree evening air as the five of them stopped beside our footrests. “First, let me introduce my wife—this is Sam, Mandy, and Sarah’s Aunt Marge.”

“It is so wonderful to finally meet both of you in person,” Aunt Marge said warmly, shaking Katie’s hand and then mine with both of hers. “I feel like I already know you two by heart from everything these three tell us at the supper table every night.”

“And second,” Uncle Richard said with a good-natured shake of his head, looking down at his nephew and nieces, “since there’s no evening Page study hall on Friday nights, these three have been begging Marge and me all afternoon to let them go for a real bus ride aboard JRTC with you and Nate so they can see firsthand how you two get around Richmond. If we aren’t intruding on your Friday night plans, how would you two feel about supervising a bipartisan field trip on the Broad Street bus to grab some supper together?”

Katie’s face lit up from ear to ear. “Intruding? We would love that!”

“Please say we can ride the Route 6 bus all the way out West Broad Street, Nate!” Sam said eagerly, bouncing slightly on his heels between his twin sisters. “We’ve watched the blue-and-white buses pass Capitol Square all month, and neither Mandy, Sarah, nor I have ever ridden a city transit bus in our lives!”

“Then you three are in for a treat,” I grinned, pointing up the block as the amber LED destination sign of a westbound blue-and-white Stalwart low-floor coach—reading 6 BROAD STREET — OAK LAWN—glided toward the curb at Ninth and Broad. “We can ride Route 6 six miles west straight up the Broad Street spine to the Oak Lawn shopping center, have dinner together at the Oak Lawn Diner where the tables have wide roll-under aisles for our wheelchairs, and then ride the eastbound Route 6 bus right back here to Downtown Richmond.”

As the forty-foot coach pulled smoothly to the brick curb, the pneumatic air suspension released with a gentle hiss, lowering the front step six inches while the exterior speaker above the folding doors chimed out clearly:

“Route 6. Oak Lawn. Welcome aboard JRTC!”

Sam, Mandy, and Sarah watched in rapt fascination as the hydraulic aluminum front ramp unfolded onto the sidewalk with a quiet whir.

“Afternoon, Delegate! Afternoon, Nate! Got a whole crew with you tonight!” the regular Friday evening JRTC operator called out cheerfully, reaching down to flip up the two cushioned bench seats over the front left and right wheelchair securement bays.

“Teaching the next generation of transit planners how the Broad Street spine works, Marcus,” Katie smiled as she and I rolled smoothly up the ramp, executed a synchronized reverse turn in the wide front vestibule, and backed our SwiftChairs into the left and right securement bays facing each other across the center aisle.

While Marcus clicked the four-point floor retractors onto our wheelchair frame brackets, Katie and I reached up to swipe our standard thirty-day unlimited JRTC magnetic passes through the farebox reader with two clean electronic beeps, and Uncle Richard stepped up to feed crisp dollar bills into the bill slot to pay the regular fare for himself, Aunt Marge, and the three triplets.

Sam, Mandy, and Sarah took the sideways bench seat directly behind my wheelchair bay, sitting shoulder to shoulder with their hands resting on the stainless-steel stanchion while Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge sat right across from them behind Katie. As the bus pulled away from Capitol Square and headed west up Broad Street, Katie reached across the center aisle to hold my right hand, just like we did on every bus ride.

“Listen to the speaker above the windshield,” I told the triplets as the coach glided through the Arts District and approached the campus of Central Virginia University.

“Eighth Street,” the onboard GPS annunciator called out in a calm, clear voice, followed block by block by “Seventh Street”, “Sixth Street”, and “Fifth Street”.

“Whoa,” Sarah whispered, her eyes wide as she looked up at the interior LED scroll bar matching the voice announcements. “It announces every single cross street along the way, even when nobody pulls the stop cord!”

“And wait until the bus makes a turn at the end of the line,” Katie told them happily. “Whenever a JRTC bus completes a turn, the GPS announces both street names on the corner inside the bus, and an exterior speaker warns pedestrians in the crosswalk outside that the bus is turning. That way, if a rider is blind, or if someone is autistic and visiting a neighborhood for the first time and needs to know their exact block so they don’t get overwhelmed, the bus tells them exactly where they are every thirty seconds.”

“Write that down in the notebook, Sam!” Mandy whispered excitedly, nudging her brother’s elbow as Sam pulled a small spiral pocket notebook and a pen out of his navy House Page blazer and began jotting down notes as fast as his hand could move.

As we rolled past the columns of the Science Museum and passed the corner of Broad and Boulevard—where Katie and I pointed out the brick facade of our winter-session apartment building at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts right across from the bus stop—Uncle Richard looked around the clean, brightly lit coach at the Central Virginia University students, hospital nurses in scrubs, and office workers riding home alongside us.

“I have to admit, Delegate,” Uncle Richard said thoughtfully, resting his arm around Aunt Marge’s shoulders, “when you spend twenty years driving a pickup truck around Danville and walking straight from a downtown Richmond parking deck into the Capitol tunnel, you never actually sit down inside a public transit bus and see how seamlessly two folks in power wheelchairs can go anywhere in the city on their own schedule without asking a single soul for a ride.”

“That’s why public transit is freedom, Uncle Richard,” Sam said seriously, looking up from his pocket notebook. “If you can’t drive a car—or if you’re thirteen like us, or if you use a SwiftChair like Delegate Prairie and Nate—a bus route with a wheelchair ramp and ten-minute service means you aren’t trapped in a house waiting on somebody else.”

Katie and I exchanged a quiet, moved glance across the center aisle, knowing without anyone having to say it out loud how much being trapped in a house meant to three kids who had survived what Sam, Mandy, and Sarah had survived a year ago.

Twenty minutes after leaving Ninth and Broad, the Route 6 bus pulled into the Oak Lawn transfer plaza at the western end of the corridor. We rolled down the front ramp onto the wide concrete sidewalk and headed half a block down the illuminated promenade to the Oak Lawn Diner, where the hostess seated the seven of us at a long front table with two open roll-under spaces at the end for Katie’s SwiftChair and mine.

Over plates of hot meatloaf, mashed potatoes, grilled cheese sandwiches, and tall glasses of ginger ale and sweet tea, the seven of us spent the happiest ninety minutes of the entire legislative session talking not like politicians from opposite parties, but like family. Sam, Mandy, and Sarah peppered Katie and me with questions about how our thirty-day magnetic swipe passes worked, how the hydraulic wheelchair lifts operated on intercity buses, and how we timed the connection between the JRTC bus and the ARTS passenger trains at Richmond Main Street Station.

By seven-fifteen, after Uncle Richard insisted on picking up the diner check for the table, we all bundled back up in our winter coats, walked and rolled back to the Oak Lawn bus stop, and boarded the eastbound JRTC Route 6 bus headed back toward Downtown Richmond.

Twenty minutes later, the bus glided to a smooth stop back under the cast-iron streetlamps at Ninth and Broad outside Capitol Square, just two blocks from the downtown hotel where the Pages stayed and where Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge kept their winter suite.

Katie and I rolled down the front ramp onto the brick sidewalk with them so we could see the triplets safely back to Capitol Square before catching the next westbound bus back up Broad Street to our apartment.

Gathered together under the warm glow of the Ninth Street lamp, I unzipped the side pocket of my laptop bag and pulled out three crisp, folded paper copies of the official JRTC System Map along with three printed Route 6 and Route 24 pocket timetable booklets.

“Since you three officially passed your first JRTC field test tonight,” Katie said, smiling warmly at Sam, Mandy, and Sarah as I handed one system map and one timetable booklet to each of the triplets, “Nate and I have a weekend homework assignment for the three of you before we meet in my office on Monday afternoon.”

Sam, Mandy, and Sarah stood up straight in their navy House Page blazers, clutching the transit maps like treasure. “What’s the homework, Delegate Prairie?” Mandy asked eagerly.

“Between now and Monday afternoon, we want the three of you to learn as much as you possibly can about JRTC,” I told them. “Read through that system map and those timetable booklets together. Look at why Route 6 works so well on Broad Street with buses every ten minutes—and then look for the gaps in the map where working people and disabled riders get stranded.”

“Specifically,” Katie added, holding up three fingers, “find out which JRTC routes stop running at six or seven o’clock at night so second-shift workers can’t get home, find out which suburban stops—like the Staples Mill train station—have zero bus service at all on Sundays, and come up with three things the General Assembly could do to help JRTC fix those gaps. We’ll go over your findings together in Room 518 on Monday afternoon!”

“We’ll read the whole map tonight!” Sam promised, his eyes shining behind his glasses as Mandy and Sarah nodded in complete unison beside him.

“Thank you for taking us on the bus, Delegate Prairie! Thank you, Nate!” Sarah and Mandy called out together, giving Katie and me a bright wave as Uncle Richard shook both of our hands warmly and Aunt Marge wished us safe travels on the train to Washington on Sunday morning.

Watching Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge walk hand-in-hand down Ninth Street with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah already unfolding their JRTC system maps under the streetlights, Katie and I turned our SwiftChairs back toward the westbound bus shelter at Ninth and Broad.

Four minutes later, the next westbound JRTC Route 6 coach knelt at the curb. Katie and I rolled aboard, swiped our passes, held hands across the center aisle for the eleven-minute ride up West Broad Street to Boulevard, and rolled inside Apartment 104 at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts—ready for a quiet weekend at home before our early Sunday morning train to Washington.

Saturday, February 6, 2016, 11:15 PM — The Studio 6B Tip-Off & The “Anatomical Verification Checkpoint” Cold Open

Because our Sunday morning alarm was set for four-thirty so we could catch the early JRTC Route 6 bus down Broad Street to Main Street Station, Katie and I planned to turn in early on Saturday night.

By eleven-fifteen on Saturday evening inside Apartment 104 at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts, our royal-blue and charcoal blazers and pressed slacks were already laid out for the morning, our reloadable blue plastic CapitalPass cards for Capital Transit were tucked into our wallets, and our two SwiftChairs were parked side by side near the bedroom wall outlet. I was just reaching for the remote control on the table to shut off the living room television when Katie’s cell phone buzzed once, then twice, then five times in rapid succession.

Katie picked it up from her lap tray and blinked at the stack of incoming text messages from three different Capitol beat reporters and the Minority Leader’s chief of staff.

“What’s going on?” I asked, pausing with my thumb over the power button on the remote. “Did Delegate Cobb pull the bill already?”

“No,” Katie said slowly, reading the messages off the glowing screen. “A producer in New York just tipped off the Richmond press corps about the eleven-thirty dress rehearsal for Saturday Night Sketch in Studio 6B. On the exact same GBS television network where I’m appearing tomorrow morning, their writers had originally built tonight’s cold open around a sketch mocking the President of the United States over this week’s White House scandal—and they just scrapped the entire Oval Office set after dress rehearsal because my floor exchange on House Bill 663 stole the show! Everyone is telling us to leave the television on right now because House Bill 663 is the star of the eleven-thirty cold open.”

I stared at my sister for two seconds, then burst out laughing and backed my SwiftChair right up beside hers in front of the television. “Well, four hours of sleep and a ninety-minute train ride to Alexandria is plenty. Let’s watch!”

Five minutes later, at eleven-thirty sharp, the network chime rang out and the broadcast of Saturday Night Sketch faded up on a painted replica of a Virginia State Capitol hallway in Studio 6B.

Right beside a mahogany door marked LADIES ROOM stood a cast member wearing a khaki state trooper uniform with an oversized foam campaign hat, a clipboard, and a yellow carpenter's tape measure clipped to his belt, sitting behind a folding card table with a hand-painted poster board sign reading:

> COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA
> ANATOMICAL VERIFICATION CHECKPOINT
> HAVE YOUR BIRTH CERTIFICATE OR FIFTY DOLLARS READY

Beside the folding table stood a second cast member wearing a gray hairpiece and a rumpled navy suit with an oversized name badge reading DELEGATE FROM SPOTSYLVANIA.

"Good evening, fellow Virginians!" the actor playing the Spotsylvania delegate declared earnestly into the camera, dabbing sweat off his forehead with a pocket handkerchief while the New York studio audience immediately started laughing. "Now, I know a lot of folks in the news media got the wrong impression this week when Delegate Katie Prairie asked me on the House Floor how my new bathroom bill, House Bill 663, is actually going to work. People are saying, 'Wait a minute, is the Commonwealth of Virginia really going to make women pull their pants down for a government official just to use the ladies' room at Virginia Dominion University or the Community College of Hampton Roads?' And I am here tonight to assure every tourist, college student, and business owner in America that we have worked out a totally normal, non-creepy system!"

He gestured proudly toward the actor in the state trooper uniform, who blew a silver referee whistle as a female cast member carrying a shopping bag walked up to the restroom door.

"Hold it right there, ma'am!" the fake trooper barked, flipping open his clipboard. "Before you enter this state-owned facility to wash your hands, pursuant to House Bill 663, I need to verify your physical anatomy for the Virginia Literary Fund! Did you bring your original hospital birth certificate with the raised county seal?"

"To go to the bathroom at the DMV?" the woman asked, blinking in disbelief. "No! Why would I carry my birth certificate in my purse?"

The fake trooper gasped and looked over at the Spotsylvania delegate. "Uh-oh, Delegate! No birth certificate in the hallway! What's Step Two in Line 18 of your bill?"

The actor playing the Spotsylvania delegate froze, his eyes going wide under the studio lights as he pulled a twenty-foot-long accordion scroll of paper out of his suit pocket and squinted at it in panic.

"Well—uh—hang on, let me check Line 18!" he stammered, his face turning beet-red as the audience howled. "We don't—nobody is suggesting we look! Wait—Officer, just ask her a trick question only a biological woman from Virginia would know! Ask her what shade of autumn cardigan she's wearing!"

“Actually, Delegate,” the woman said dryly, pulling a crisp fifty-dollar bill out of her wallet and slapping it onto the card table, “if the options in Spotsylvania County are handing a state trooper my birth certificate, answering questions about my pants, or paying fifty bucks to buy schoolbooks for the Virginia Literary Fund, here’s fifty dollars—because clearly Spotsylvania County needs all the schoolbooks it can get!”

The studio audience erupted into cheers and applause as the actor playing the delegate stared helplessly into the camera lens for four silent seconds—mimicking Delegate Martin Cobb’s exact four-second freeze-frame from Thursday afternoon’s House Floor broadcast—before dropping into the folding chair behind the card table and shouting into the camera, “I pass the bill by for the day, Mr. Speaker—and live from Midtown New York, it’s Saturday Night Sketch!”

In our living room on West Broad Street, I was laughing so hard my shoulders shook, while Katie sat staring at the opening saxophone montage with both hands pressed over her warm cheeks.

“And in nine hours,” I grinned, clicking off the television so we could climb into our shared sleeping bag sanctuary for four hours of sleep before the alarm, “you get to take the train up to Washington and finish that bill off for good.”

Sunday, February 7, 2016, 6:05 AM to 2:05 PM — Train 164 from Main Street Station, The Charles R. Fenwick Bridge, & Live on Meet the Nation

At five-fifteen on Sunday morning, while the rest of Richmond was still fast asleep in the February dark, Katie and I rolled out onto West Broad Street in our winter coats over our broadcast suits, caught the early Sunday morning eastbound JRTC Route 6 bus down the hill into Shockoe Bottom, and took the station elevator up to the historic train shed at Richmond Main Street Station.

At six-oh-five on the dot, the bright headlamp of ARTS Northeast Regional Train 164 swung around the curve from the Peninsula Subdivision and glided alongside the high-level platform. We rolled side by side into the warm Business Class car at the rear of the consist, engaged the electromagnetic brakes of our SwiftChairs inside the two integrated mobility bays we had reserved on Friday morning, and traded the February chill for the quiet hum of the floorboard heaters.

Because crossing the narrow, shifting steel vestibule diaphragm between railcars on a moving train was completely unsafe in a power wheelchair, neither Katie nor I ever tried to roll into the Café Car while the train was in motion. Instead, ten minutes north of Main Street Station, when the friendly Business Class conductor came down the aisle to scan our tickets, he pulled out his notepad and offered to run across the vestibule to the Café Car and bring breakfast back to our mobility bays for us.

Because Katie and I were twins, we copied each other for food all the time without even thinking about it. Both of us ordered the exact same breakfast from the conductor: a warm bacon, egg, and cheese biscuit, a sweet cheese Danish, and a cold bottle of apple juice as our complimentary Business Class drink.

When the conductor returned a few minutes later carrying a cardboard tray and set the two identical paper-wrapped biscuits, the two identical Danishes, and the two identical bottles of cold apple juice onto our lap trays, Katie and I thanked him and paid for our food. Ordinarily, whenever the two of us were wide awake and in a playful mood, ordering the exact same meal meant one of us would immediately point across our armrests at the other's tray and say, "Hey, you have my biscuit!" or "You have my juice!" Right now at six-twenty in the morning, however, running on four hours of sleep inside a warm, gently swaying train car, neither of us was in a playful mood—we were both still half asleep. Without a single word of teasing, we unwrapped our matching bacon, egg, and cheese biscuits and Danishes in sleepy twin synchrony, sipped our cold apple juice with heavy eyelids, and rested our heads back against our headrests.

For the next hour and a half, as the winter sun rose pale pink and gold over the Rappahannock River at Fredericksburg and the Potomac creeks along Quantico, nobody asked Katie about House Bill 663, nobody shoved a microphone in her face, and nobody recognized us. We were just Katie and Nate again, riding the rails together the way we loved best.

At seven-fifty sharp, Train 164 pulled to a stop at Alexandria Union Station beneath the white stone spire of the George Washington Masonic Memorial.

Rather than staying onboard for the slow twenty-eight-minute crawl through the freight switches into Washington Union Station, we detrained onto the brick platform at Alexandria with the station attendant's portable lift, followed the flat brick walkway a hundred and fifty feet straight into the King Street–Old Town Capital Transit station, and pulled our blue plastic CapitalPass cards out of our wallets—the exact same reloadable farecards we had carried on weekend family trips to Washington with Dad when we were growing up in Virginia Beach.

We tapped our CapitalPass cards against the circular target pads on the wide accessible faregate, rode the elevator up to the island platform, and rolled straight onto a waiting northbound Yellow Line train.

Twelve minutes later, just past the Pentagon tunnel portal, our silver railcar burst out into the bright morning sunlight high above the Potomac River on the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge.

Directly to our right across the shimmering gray water, the northbound highway lanes of Interstate 395 on the 14th Street Bridge were backed up for half a mile behind an early-morning fender bender and a highway maintenance truck—the exact traffic jam a network limousine would have been stuck idling in right then. Out here on the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge, our Yellow Line train flew across the river at fifty miles an hour with a clear view of the white marble dome of the Jefferson Memorial and the Washington Monument rising against the crisp Sunday sky.

"Told you the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge beats the 14th Street Bridge every single time," I said, grinning across the aisle of the railcar as we glided smoothly into the L'Enfant Plaza portal in southwest Washington at eight-twelve.

"Every single time," Katie agreed as we rolled off the train, tapped our blue CapitalPass cards at the wide accessible faregate, and rode the station elevator up to the street level at Seventh Street and Maryland Avenue Southwest.

Instead of staying on the subway to transfer deep underground at Gallery Place for the Red Line into the cavernous, echoing concourse of Washington Union Station—the exact sensory ambush we had avoided by getting off the ARTS train at Alexandria—we rolled fifty feet down the sunny brick sidewalk to the Seventh Street bus shelter just as a northbound low-floor Capital Transit Route P6 bus pulled to the curb.

The bus knelt with a pneumatic hiss, the front ramp unfolded, and Katie and I rolled aboard into the front wheelchair bays. When we tapped our blue CapitalPass cards against the circular target on the farebox within two hours of exiting the Yellow Line, the screen flashed green with Capital Transit's automatic rail-to-bus transfer discount—making our local D.C. bus connection completely free.

For the next twelve minutes, holding hands across the center aisle of the Route P6 bus, we glided straight north up Seventh Street across the open green lawn of the National Mall between the Air and Space Museum and the National Gallery of Art, swung east along Constitution Avenue past the gleaming white marble dome of the United States Capitol, and turned north up Louisiana Avenue and North Capitol Street.

At eight-thirty-two, the Route P6 driver deployed the front ramp right at the curb on North Capitol Street Northwest, half a block from the GBS News Washington bureau.

When we rolled through the security glass of the Washington broadcast bureau at eight-thirty-five, Arthur Vance nearly dropped his coffee mug when he realized Katie had actually come all the way from Richmond on a JRTC city bus, a Business Class intercity train, a Yellow Line subway car across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge, and the Route P6 bus across the National Mall without a single staffer or chauffeur in tow.

Inside the main studio, the floor crew had cleared away the standard swivel guest chair and projected a high-resolution panorama of Thomas Jefferson's white-columned Virginia State Capitol across the curved LED wall directly behind Katie's tape mark, while the large flat-screen studio monitor to the side glowed blue with the program banner reading MEET THE NATION — DEL. KATIE PRAIRIE. When a well-meaning stage manager asked if Camera One should crop the frame tight around Katie's shoulders so viewers wouldn't focus on her wheelchair, Katie shook her head politely and rested her hand on her joystick armrest.

"Keep the frame wide enough to show my chair, please," Katie told him warmly. "A lot of people watching across the country this morning have never seen a legislator in a power wheelchair on a Sunday morning show, and I don't hide who I am."

Five minutes before air, the floor director clipped the miniature broadcast microphone to the lapel of Katie's royal-blue blazer and fitted the clear plastic IFB earpiece into her right ear, then guided me to my spot right beside the studio confidence monitor just outside the wide camera lens—completely out of the broadcast frame so there was zero confusion about who held the constitutional office, yet close enough that Katie had a clear, unobstructed sightline to me the entire time.

Underneath the glowing MEET THE NATION — DEL. KATIE PRAIRIE studio monitor, I engaged the electromagnetic brakes of my SwiftChair and opened my silver MagnaBook Pro across my lap tray. On my screen sat the exact statutory text of House Bill 663 alongside a list of the fourteen Fortune 500 corporate headquarters located in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

“Thirty seconds to live, Delegate,” the stage manager called out softly as the iconic brass orchestra fanfare of Meet the Nation echoed through the studio monitors.

Katie rested her right hand calmly near her joystick controller and her left hand on her armrest, looking briefly over at me. I gave my twin sister a steady nod from behind my laptop screen.

The red tally light atop Camera One flared bright red.

“If it’s Sunday, it’s Meet the Nation,” moderator David Vance’s voice resonated across the studio and into millions of living rooms from coast to coast. “Joining us live in our Washington studio this morning—after riding the early morning train up from Richmond Main Street Station and the Yellow Line across the Potomac—is Virginia Delegate Katie Prairie of Virginia Beach, whose blistering ninety-five-second exchange on the floor of the Virginia House of Delegates over House Bill 663 has been viewed more than twelve million times since Thursday afternoon, and was even immortalized last night in the cold open on late-night television. Delegate Prairie, welcome to Meet the Nation.”

“Good morning, David,” Katie said evenly, keeping her eyes focused straight into the glass lens of Camera One. “Thank you for having me—and the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge was wide open all the way across the river.”

“Delegate, let’s start with that moment on the House Floor on Thursday,” Vance said, as the broadcast aired the ninety-five-second floor clip side by side with our live studio feed. “You held up the printed text of House Bill 663 and asked the bill’s patron why you, or any woman or girl in the Commonwealth of Virginia, should have to pull her pants down for a government official or a police officer just to use the ladies’ room at a community college, a public university, or the State Capitol. Critics on the other side of the aisle claim you were being deliberately theatrical to embarrass the majority. Did you plan that line to go viral?”

“Not at all, David,” Katie replied, her voice calm, clear, and completely literal. “Anyone who knows my twin brother Nate and me back home in Virginia Beach and Norfolk knows I don’t do political theater. We write computer software for a living, and when a bill is placed on our desks in the House of Delegates, my job as a constitutional officer is to read every single word literally—because the courts and the police have to enforce the literal words we put into the Code of Virginia, not whatever talking point a politician gives at a press conference afterward.”

Out of the corner of her eye, Katie glanced toward my chair as I tapped the touchpad of my laptop beside the studio monitor.

“And when you read Line 18 on Page 1 and Line 54 on Page 2 of House Bill 663 side by side,” Katie continued smoothly, “the bill applies to every public building, public school, and public college campus owned or leased by the Commonwealth. It defines compliance not by an identification card or how someone lives their daily life, but strictly by what it calls ‘a person’s anatomy,’ and it authorizes any law enforcement officer to issue a fifty-dollar civil summons for the Literary Fund. As someone who has used a power wheelchair full-time since I was sixteen years old—and who had to pull out a steel tape measure before my freshman session just to get an ADA-compliant restroom stall wide enough to close the door in privacy inside our own State Capitol complex—I asked the gentleman from Spotsylvania that question on Thursday because I wanted a literal, legal answer to a basic Fourth Amendment problem: since police officers standing in the hallway of the State Capitol, Virginia Dominion University, or the Community College of Hampton Roads do not carry a filing cabinet of citizens' birth certificates, how can an officer prove a citizen's physical anatomy in General District Court without conducting an invasive physical search?"

"And as millions of Americans saw on Thursday—and again in parody last night in New York—the patron couldn't answer you," Vance noted. "Instead, the Majority Leader had to pass the bill by for the day. What are you hearing from Virginia's business community and House leadership ahead of tomorrow's noon session?"

"What I can tell you is that employers, universities, and families across Hampton Roads, Richmond, and Northern Virginia are deeply alarmed," Katie said clearly. "Virginia is home to the largest naval base in the world at Norfolk, major shipbuilding and port facilities, world-class public universities like Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute and Virginia Dominion University, and fourteen Fortune 500 corporate headquarters. Transgender women are women, transgender men are men, and none of those employers—and none of the working families I represent in Virginia Beach—sent us to Richmond to waste taxpayer money turning police officers into fifty-dollar bathroom inspectors or turning our Commonwealth into a national punchline. We have coastal flooding to mitigate, public transit systems to expand, disability Medicaid waitlists to clear, and classrooms to fund."

"One final question before we let you go, Delegate Prairie," Vance said, his tone warming with genuine respect. "A lot of viewers across the country are meeting you for the very first time this weekend. You entered public life after fighting to fix public transit schedules in Hampton Roads, and now you've single-handedly brought one of the most controversial bills in the country to a dead halt. Do you have your sights set on higher office down the road—perhaps the State Senate or even here in Washington?"

Just off-camera beneath the studio monitor, I smiled faintly above my laptop keyboard.

"Right now, David, my only focus is noon tomorrow in the building right behind me," Katie said, gesturing slightly toward the glowing image of the Virginia State Capitol behind her SwiftChair, "and catching the eleven-twelve ARTS train out of Alexandria with my brother so we can get back to Richmond this afternoon. Once we make sure House Bill 663 is permanently laid on the table where it belongs, I have transportation and accessibility amendments to pass for the people of Virginia Beach."

"Delegate Katie Prairie of Virginia Beach, thank you for joining us this morning," Vance said.

By nine-eighteen, the red tally light atop Camera One clicked off and the floor director unclipped the miniature microphone from the lapel of Katie's royal-blue blazer.

Arthur Vance walked out onto the studio floor holding his cell phone with wide eyes alongside two fresh mugs from the green room. "Delegate Prairie, our control room phones are already lighting up from Capitol Hill to Richmond, and the Associated Wire just put out an urgent alert from the Virginia State Capitol—House leadership just announced they are sending House Bill 663 back to the General Laws subcommittee tomorrow morning to strike it from the docket before the noon floor gavel even falls! You're welcome to relax in the hospitality suite as long as you like, and whenever you're ready to head back to Virginia, our driver can bring the town car around."

"Thank you, Mr. Vance, but we really do have that eleven-twelve train to catch at Alexandria," Katie said politely, handing her clear plastic earpiece back to the audio technician.

She had been sitting upright in that stiff royal-blue broadcast blazer, button-down collar, and tailored dress slacks since four-forty-five in the morning on four hours of sleep, and under the hot studio lights her sensory limit was nearly maxed out. Waiting around until three-thirty-eight in the afternoon for the direct one-seat Peninsula train back to Main Street Station would have meant spending four more hours trapped in formal interview clothes.

At nine-twenty-five sharp, I closed my silver laptop, tucked it into my bag, and rolled out the front doors onto North Capitol Street right beside my sister.

We caught the southbound Capital Transit Route P6 bus right back across the National Mall to Seventh Street Southwest, rode the street elevator down into L'Enfant Plaza, tapped our blue CapitalPass cards at the wide accessible gate with the automatic bus-to-rail transfer credit, and rode a southbound Yellow Line train right back out into the bright morning sun across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge. By ten-fifteen, we rolled off the King Street–Old Town platform, waited together in the quiet brick waiting room of Alexandria Union Station, and boarded the Business Class car of southbound ARTS Northeast Regional Train 143 with the station attendant's portable lift at eleven-twelve on the dot.

Now that the television cameras were behind us and House Bill 663 was headed for the legislative graveyard, both of us were finally wide awake and in a much lighter mood. When the Business Class conductor walked back from the Café Car and set two complimentary bottles of cold apple juice onto our lap trays, Katie glanced sideways at my identical bottle with a playful twin grin and said, "Hey—you have my juice!"

"Pretty sure yours is the one on your tray, sis," I laughed, clinking my bottle against hers across the aisle.

As the train glided south past Quantico and Fredericksburg, Katie's cell phone buzzed nonstop inside her bag with texts from delegates, reporters, and national political producers. She didn't answer a single one. She leaned her head back against her headrest, sipped her cold apple juice, and watched the winter pine trees blur past the window while I held her hand across the aisle.

At one-oh-two in the afternoon, Train 143 pulled to a stop at the suburban Staples Mill station in Henrico County.

Waiting right outside the station doors in the reserved charter lane was the white lift-equipped ARTS Thruway 8443 connecting motorcoach with RICHMOND MAIN STREET glowing on its amber destination sign. Because our Business Class tickets were booked through to Main Street, the driver already had the hydraulic wheelchair lift unfolded and waiting on the curb before we even rolled through the sliding glass doors.

In less than ten minutes, the driver secured both of our SwiftChairs into the floor tracks of the coach, raised the lift, and pulled straight out onto Interstate 64 East toward downtown. By one-thirty-five, the Thruway shuttle dropped us right beneath the historic clock tower at Richmond Main Street Station, where we caught the Sunday afternoon westbound JRTC Route 6 bus straight up Broad Street to Boulevard.

At five minutes past two—while the political panels in Washington and the Governor's staff in Richmond were still replaying her nine o'clock interview on every screen—I unlocked the front door of Apartment 104 at the Broad & Boulevard Lofts.

Katie rolled straight into the bedroom, unbuttoned that stiff royal-blue television blazer, hung it up in the closet, and traded her starched collar and dress slacks for her softest gray cotton sweatshirt and fleece sweatpants. Five minutes later, after I had ditched my charcoal suit and tie for an old Virginia Beach t-shirt and athletic pants, we parked our SwiftChairs side by side near the living room window overlooking West Broad Street, kicked up our footrests, and enjoyed the quietest Sunday afternoon in Richmond.

The next morning, Monday, February 8, just before the noon floor session convened at the Capitol, the House majority recommitted House Bill 663 back to the General Laws subcommittee room downstairs to dispose of it without forcing their members to cast a recorded roll-call vote on the Floor.

With television cameras crammed shoulder-to-shoulder along the side walls, the subcommittee chairman called House Bill 663 up and didn't even allow debate.

"Is there a motion to lay House Bill 663 on the table?" the chairman asked briskly.

"So moved," a majority member muttered without looking up from his desk.

"All in favor of laying the bill on the table say aye—all opposed say no—the ayes have it, and House Bill 663 is laid on the table!" the chairman announced in a single breath, banging his gavel to kill his own party's bathroom bill on an unrecorded voice vote before anyone could demand a roll call.

Standing by the lectern as his bill died in nine seconds flat—alongside an equally furious Delegate Robert Marsh, who was already muttering under his breath that he would bring his own "Physical Privacy Act" back next session—Delegate Martin Cobb glared down the dais at his own party's members, gathered up his folders, and snapped into the open air as he stormed out the door:

"I'm going to pray that you all get courage!"

At the accessible end of the room, Katie watched the bill's patron stomp out into the hallway, turned her head toward my wheelchair, and gave me the quietest, proudest twin smile in the world as we reached across our armrests and squeezed each other's hand.

Across the Rotunda: The Senate of Virginia

Watching Senator Ward Kill Our Bills Across the Rotunda & The 250-Signature Petition

Watching Senator Ward Kill Our Bills Across the Rotunda, Brainstorming the 7th Senate District with Dad, & The 250-Signature Rule

Date: 2018-02-22 at 15:10 America/New_York

Thursday, February 22, 2018, 3:10 PM — The Graveyard Across the Capitol Rotunda

“House Bill 412, patroned by Delegate Prairie of Virginia Beach, relating to dedicated regional public-transit operating assistance and Priority-One developmental-disability Medicaid waiver slots,” the committee clerk read aloud inside the crowded Senate Finance subcommittee room on the afternoon after the mid-session crossover deadline.

Parked side by side in our compact SwiftChairs in front of the witness table—with a dozen CVTA bus riders and three mothers of developmentally disabled adults from Virginia Beach and Norfolk sitting nervously behind us after riding the morning train up to Richmond—thirty-two-year-old Katie and I looked up at the raised mahogany dais of the Senate of Virginia.

It had taken Katie four years of relentless, brick-by-brick legislative work in the hundred-member House of Delegates to get House Bill 412 across the Capitol Rotunda. After winning re-election in 2015 and 2017—and after the 2017 wave brought our side within a single seat of parity in the House—Katie had worked across the aisle with coastal moderates like our Virginia Beach colleague Delegate Ronald Villa to pass House Bill 412 off the House Floor by a bipartisan sixty-two-to-thirty-eight vote. The bill did two things our constituents in Hampton Roads desperately needed: it dedicated a permanent stream of regional transportation revenue to expand evening and Sunday CVTA and JRTC bus service, and it funded fifteen hundred new Priority-One developmental-disability Medicaid waiver slots so Virginia adults with developmental disabilities—people just like our cousin Chelsea up in Newport, Rhode Island—wouldn’t sit on an emergency waiting list for ten years when their parents grew old.

Now the bill had crossed the rotunda to the forty-member Senate of Virginia, where Republicans held a narrow twenty-one-to-nineteen majority.

And sitting right in the center chair behind the subcommittee gavel was our own hometown State Senator—twenty-year incumbent Senator Franklin Ward of the Seventh Senate District in Virginia Beach.

“Delegate Prairie, you have two minutes to present your bill,” Senator Ward said smoothly, barely looking up from his leather folio as he checked his gold wristwatch.

Katie rolled her SwiftChair flush to the witness microphone and laid out the exact fiscal math of House Bill 412 in ninety seconds—showing how every dollar was already paid for without raising a single tax on working families, and gesturing behind us toward the Virginia Beach parents and bus commuters who had taken a vacation day from work just to testify.

Senator Ward didn’t ask a single question about the math, and he didn’t call a single citizen witness from the sign-up sheet.

“Thank you, Delegate Prairie, we all know how fond you and your brother are of buses,” Senator Ward said with a dismissive wave of his hand. “Unfortunately, this subcommittee has other highway priorities for Hampton Roads this afternoon. Do I hear a motion to pass House Bill 412 by indefinitely?”

“So moved,” a majority senator muttered beside him.

“All in favor say aye—opposed no—the ayes have it, and House Bill 412 is passed by indefinitely,” Senator Ward announced, rapping his wooden gavel once to kill the bill for the year before the mothers in the back row could even stand up from their chairs. “Next bill on the docket.”

Behind us, one of the mothers from Kempsville—whose twenty-nine-year-old nonverbal son had been waiting six years for a disability support waiver—let out a quiet, heartbroken breath and lowered her printed testimony back into her purse.

Katie didn’t yell or pound the witness table. She turned her SwiftChair around, rolled back to the visitor rows with me right beside her, and spent ten minutes holding the hands of every parent and bus rider who had traveled up from Hampton Roads, promising them on her word of honor that she wasn’t done fighting for them.

Twenty minutes later, after we had accompanied the families down to the Ninth and Main bus stop to catch their ride to Main Street Station, Katie and I rolled back into the center of the historic Capitol Rotunda on the second floor.

In the quiet marble rotunda directly beneath Thomas Jefferson’s dome, the tall mahogany entrance doors of the House of Delegates Chamber stood to our south, while the mahogany doors of the Senate of Virginia Chamber stood directly opposite to our north.

Katie braked her SwiftChair right in the center of the black-and-white marble floor between the two chambers and stared at the closed doors of the Senate of Virginia.

“Four years, Nate,” Katie said quietly, her voice vibrating with focused steel as she reached across our armrests to grip my right hand. “We spent four years building a bipartisan coalition in a hundred-member House of Delegates to pass that bill, and our own State Senator from Virginia Beach killed it in ninety seconds across the rotunda without even letting our constituents speak.”

“Because in a bicameral legislature, passing a bill through the House is only half the equation,” I said, squeezing her fingers back. “As long as Franklin Ward holds a committee gavel in a twenty-one-to-nineteen Senate, he can bury every single transit bill and disability-waiver bill we pass.”

Katie’s blue eyes stayed locked on the north doors of the Senate Chamber.

“The Seventh Senate District covers western and central Virginia Beach and eastern Norfolk,” Katie said slowly. “Every single precinct of our Eighty-Fifth House District in Kempsville sits right inside the heart of Franklin Ward’s Seventh Senate District. And next year—November 2019—all forty seats in the Senate of Virginia are on the ballot.”

I looked at my twin sister, feeling the exact same electric charge I had felt in the Capitol elevator six years earlier.

“Let’s finish out this session,” I whispered, “and when we get home to Kempsville, let’s sit down with Dad.”

Saturday, November 10, 2018, 5:00 PM — Brainstorming the Jump to the State Senate Around Our Kempsville Table

“Walk me through the difference between being a State Delegate and being a State Senator,” our sixty-year-old dad said that autumn as the three of us sat around our oak kitchen table off Military Highway in Kempsville with three tall glasses of ginger ale and my MagnaBook Pro open to the map of the Seventh Senate District of Virginia. “You’re already in state politics in Richmond, Katie, and the voters of the Eighty-Fifth House District have elected you three times in a row by bigger margins every election. If a constituent on the Route 12 bus asks you tomorrow morning why you’re jumping from the House of Delegates to run for the Senate of Virginia, what’s the answer?”

“Three reasons, Dad,” thirty-three-year-old Katie answered, holding up three fingers from her SwiftChair armrest.

“First,” Katie said, “is what happened to House Bill 412 in February. The Virginia General Assembly has two chambers. In the hundred-member House of Delegates, I’m one vote out of a hundred, and even when we build a bipartisan coalition and pass a bill through the House, it has to cross the rotunda and pass the forty-member Senate of Virginia. Right now, the Senate is split twenty-one to nineteen, and our own State Senator here in the Seventh District—Franklin Ward—uses his seniority on Senate Finance and Transportation to kill regional public-transit funding, developmental-disability Medicaid waivers, and minimum-wage increases before they ever reach the Senate Floor. If I stay in the House, we can keep passing bills every February and watching Senator Ward throw them in the trash can every March.”

“Second,” I said, tapping the legislative math chart I had coded on my laptop screen, “look at the structural difference between the two chambers. In the House of Delegates, there are a hundred members and everyone runs for re-election every two years. In the Senate of Virginia, there are only forty members, and they serve four-year terms. One State Senator represents two and a half times the voting weight of a Delegate. Even bigger: because the Senate is split twenty-one to nineteen right now, flipping just two Senate seats next November flips the entire Senate of Virginia into a Democratic majority. And under the Senate's seniority and caucus rules, if Katie wins the Seventh Senate District and we win the majority, she won't just be one voice at the end of a committee table—she'll be handed the gavel as Chair of a standing Senate committee and sit on Senate Transportation and Finance."

"And third," Katie said, tracing the boundary lines of the Seventh Senate District across my screen from Kempsville and Bellamy Manor up past CCHR, Princess Anne Road, Pembroke Commons, Bayside, and across Newtown Road into eastern Norfolk, "look at who lives in the Seventh Senate District. A House of Delegates district has about eighty thousand residents. A Virginia Senate district has two hundred thousand residents—equivalent to two and a half House districts combined. Every single neighborhood I already represent in the Eighty-Fifth House District is right here inside the Seventh Senate District, alongside the exact CCHR, Pembroke, Newtown Road, and Military Highway bus corridors Nate and I have ridden and written about since 2005."

Dad leaned back in his chair, nodding slowly as he took in the whole picture.

"And what about your current seat in the Eighty-Fifth House District?" Dad asked. "Do you have to resign from the House of Delegates early to run for the State Senate?"

"Not a single day early," I replied. "In Virginia, every twenty-year cycle aligns so that in 2019, all one hundred seats in the House of Delegates and all forty seats in the Senate of Virginia are up for election on the exact same Tuesday—November 5, 2019. Katie serves every single day of her current two-year House term through the 2019 legislative session and all the way to January 2020. Instead of filing for re-election to the Eighty-Fifth House District ballot next spring, she files for the Seventh Senate District ballot—and Andre Askew, who has worked right alongside us in Kempsville for the past four years, is ready to run for Katie's Eighty-Fifth House seat so our district stays in good hands."

Dad pulled his familiar yellow legal pad and black pen across the kitchen table—the exact same routine the three of us had followed in 2010 for City Council and in 2012 for the House of Delegates.

"Alright, Mr. Campaign Manager and Mr. Treasurer," Dad said with a grin, writing Katie Prairie for Virginia Senate — 7th District (2019) across the top line. "Since we're already registered in the State Board of Elections system from Katie's House races, what changes legally under Title 24.2 of the Code of Virginia when a sitting Delegate files for the State Senate?"

"Four main things," I said, opening our 2019 statutory checklist:

"First, right after the 2019 winter session adjourns in late February, we file an amended Statement of Organization in COMET transitioning our campaign committee to Katie Prairie for Virginia Senate, keeping you as official Campaign Treasurer and me as Campaign Manager and Chief Technology Officer. Second, Katie files her Certificate of Candidate Qualification under Section 24.2-501, her Declaration of Candidacy under Section 24.2-520, and her updated General Assembly Statement of Economic Interests. Third, because the Seventh Senate District spans two localities—both the City of Virginia Beach and the eastern precincts of the City of Norfolk—our ballot qualification paperwork and primary filing fee get verified across both cities' voter registrars under the State Board of Elections."

"And fourth," Katie added with a determined smile, "the voter petition signature threshold doubles. Under Code of Virginia Section 24.2-506, a House of Delegates candidate needs one hundred and twenty-five qualified voter signatures, while a candidate for the Senate of Virginia is required by law to turn in at least two hundred and fifty signatures of qualified voters registered inside the Seventh Senate District."

"In 2013 we needed one hundred and twenty-five and collected four hundred and twelve," Dad said, tapping his pen decisively against the legal pad. "So for a two-hundred-and-fifty-signature State Senate requirement across two hundred thousand people in Virginia Beach and Norfolk, we're collecting at least eight hundred verified signatures."

"Eight hundred it is," I smiled, reaching across the table to clasp Dad's hand and Katie's hand together.

Spring 2019 — Senator Ward Ducks the Race & Collecting 824 Signatures Along Route 20 and Route 25

In late February 2019, twenty-four hours after the forty-five-day winter legislative session adjourned in Richmond, Katie sat in her SwiftChair at the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus bus transfer loop flanked by me, Dad, and forty daily bus commuters and disability advocates to formally announce her candidacy for the Seventh Senate District of Virginia.

Three weeks later, after seeing our first internal poll and watching volunteers line up four-deep around our wheelchairs at the Pembroke Commons, Glenrock Mall, and CCHR bus stops to sign Katie's nominating petitions, twenty-year incumbent State Senator Franklin Ward stunned the Capitol press corps by announcing his sudden retirement rather than face Delegate Katie Prairie on the November ballot.

Instead, the majority party establishment poured over a million dollars in corporate PAC money behind Senator Ward's handpicked successor—a wealthy commercial real-estate attorney who immediately attacked Katie's regional transit plan as a "socialist giveaway to inner-city buses."

With Dad walking beside our SwiftChairs every weekend holding the legal-sized petition clipboards and signing the circulator affidavits before a notary, and with me checking every signer's street address across both the Virginia Beach and Norfolk voter rolls on my laptop, we turned in eight hundred and twenty-four verified voter signatures to the State Board of Elections in March 2019—more than triple the two-hundred-and-fifty-signature statutory requirement—qualifying Katie unopposed as the Democratic Nominee for the Seventh Senate District.

Flipping the Seventh Senate District, The Mahogany Senate Ramp, & Madam Chair

Flipping the Seventh Senate District, Custom-Milling the Mahogany Senate Ramp, & Swearing In as Madam Chair

Date: 2019-11-05 at 19:30 America/New_York

Tuesday, November 5, 2019, 7:30 PM — Winning the Seventh Senate District & Flipping the Senate of Virginia

“Norfolk precincts around Newtown Road and Glenrock just uploaded to the State Board of Elections server,” I called out at seven-thirty on Election Night—Tuesday, November 5, 2019—as my custom PHP precinct-aggregation script refreshed on my laptop screen inside our packed campaign headquarters off Kempsville Road. “And here come the early-vote and seven-o’clock precinct totals from CCHR, Bellamy Manor, Brandon, Pembroke, and the polling place over by Fairlawn Recreation Center on Marlborough Drive!”

Sitting right beside my left armrest in her compact SwiftChair, thirty-four-year-old Katie leaned in while Dad stood behind our two wheelchairs with his hand resting proudly on my shoulder.

Unlike our first House race six years earlier—when we had watched eighteen Kempsville precincts around our kitchen table—the Seventh Senate District spanned fifty-four precincts across western and central Virginia Beach and eastern Norfolk. For seven straight months from April through November, Katie, Dad, and I had ridden every CVTA bus route connecting the two cities—Route 1, Route 12, Route 15, Route 20, Route 25, Route 29, Route 33, and, starting in October 2019, the brand-new Route 24 running along Kempsville Road and Witchduck Road to Pembroke East—canvassing thousands of doors from Kempsville and Larkspur all the way north to Bayside and west across Newtown Road into Norfolk. In fact, the launch of that new Route 24 corridor along Kempsville Road and Witchduck Road in October 2019 (a completely separate north-south route from the historic, long-retired Laskin Road route that had merely shared a recycled route number years earlier) had marked a personal milestone for Katie and me: the exact month Route 24 began rolling down Kempsville Road, we had pooled our software consulting savings to buy our own single-story brick ranch on Lord Nelson Drive strictly fifty-fifty right off the new Route 24 bus line, installing a second custom two-person roll-up hydrotherapy tub and outfitting the master walk-in closet as our enclosed sleeping sanctuary while Dad kept the original brick ranch on Arvin Road off Indian River Road and Military Highway in the family.

And because voters across Virginia Beach and Norfolk remembered Delegate Katie Prairie as the lawmaker who had stood up to the bathroom-bill bullies on Meet the Nation in 2016 and fought every single winter for their buses, schools, and disability waivers, the corporate attack mailers against her hadn’t stood a chance.

“Look at the margin in Kempsville and around CCHR, Katie,” I said, my voice catching as the green rows populated down my screen at 7:54 PM. “You’re carrying your home Eighty-Fifth House precincts by twenty-two points—Andre Askew just won your House seat right on your coattails—and you’re winning the Bayside, Pembroke, and eastern Norfolk precincts by eleven points!”

Ten minutes later, at 8:04 PM, the statewide television monitors mounted above the headquarters room chimed in unison.

First came the Seventh Senate District projection:

PROJECTED WINNER — 7TH SENATE DISTRICT: DEL. KATIE PRAIRIE (D-VIRGINIA BEACH) ELECTED TO THE SENATE OF VIRGINIA (55.8% – 44.2%).

And eighteen minutes after that, a roar went up across the room that rattled the storefront windows when the statewide banner flashed across the bottom of the screen:

BREAKING NEWS: DEMOCRATS FLIP CONTROL OF BOTH THE SENATE OF VIRGINIA AND THE VIRGINIA HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Katie turned her head toward me, her eyes bright with tears as she threw her arms around my neck across our wheelchair armrests while Dad wrapped both of us in a bear hug from behind.

“No more watching our bills die across the rotunda, Nate,” Katie whispered against my shoulder. “Our caucus isn’t in the minority anymore. Come January, I hold a committee gavel.”

December 2019 to Wednesday, January 8, 2020 — The Custom-Milled Mahogany Ramp & Swearing In as Madam Chair

In the weeks between Election Night and the January 2020 Opening Day of the General Assembly, the transition from the House of Delegates to the Senate of Virginia looked very different from our first arrival in Richmond six years earlier.

After the Electoral Boards of the City of Virginia Beach and the City of Norfolk completed their official multi-locality canvass and the Virginia State Board of Elections transmitted Katie’s gold-sealed Certificate of Election as Senator-Elect for the Seventh Senatorial District under Code of Virginia Section 24.2-675, Katie received a phone call at our home in Kempsville on the first Monday of December.

It wasn’t from a mid-level facilities bureaucrat telling her to wait until March. It was from William, the veteran Clerk of the Senate of Virginia, calling personally alongside the newly elected Senate Majority Leader.

“Senator-Elect Prairie,” the Clerk said warmly on speakerphone across our desk, “in the two-hundred-and-forty-year history of the Senate of Virginia, you are the very first State Senator ever elected to sit in our chamber in a wheelchair—and the Majority Caucus has just designated you to serve as Chair of the Senate Committee on Rehabilitation and Social Services, as well as a senior member of Senate Transportation and Senate Finance. I want you and Nathaniel to ride up to the Capitol this week so our master architectural woodworkers can measure your SwiftChair in person. When you roll into the Senate of Virginia on January eighth, everything in our chamber is going to look like Thomas Jefferson built it for you himself."

Three days later, when Katie and I rode the morning ARTS train and the JRTC Route 6 bus up to Capitol Square and rolled into the second-floor Senate wing, the Clerk of the Senate was waiting for us with the Capitol's master cabinetmakers and historic preservation carpenters.

Inside the neoclassical Office of the Clerk of the Senate—where tall white marble Ionic columns framed the floor-to-ceiling volumes of the Virginia Acts of Assembly—the carpenters were already constructing a lowered, wheelchair-accessible section of the polished mahogany reception counter so Senator Katie Prairie could sign official Senate parchments and pre-file bills at eye level with me parked right beside her.

And inside the Senate of Virginia Chamber itself, under the tall arched windows and the crimson carpet of the forty-member upper house, the Clerk led us up to the front aisle where the senior committee chairs sat.

Not only had the cabinetmakers modified the front-aisle mahogany desk for the Chair of Rehabilitation and Social Services so Katie's compact SwiftChair rolled smoothly underneath the desktop without a single obstruction, they had also designed a permanent, custom-milled solid-mahogany wheelchair ramp leading directly up to the Clerk's well and the Senate dais—complete with matching turned mahogany balusters and brass handrails stained to the exact eighteenth-century patina of the chamber's historic woodwork.

"Look at the grain on that mahogany, Katie," I murmured as Katie tested the gentle one-in-twelve slope of the new Senate ramp in her SwiftChair and rolled effortlessly up to the Clerk's well. "Anyone looking down from the Senate gallery is going to assume that ramp has been part of this Capitol for two hundred years."

"And it's staying here for the next two hundred years," the Clerk of the Senate smiled.

On Opening Day—Wednesday, January 8, 2020, at twelve o'clock noon—after we had unpacked our familiar winter-session sanctuary at Apartment 104 of the Broad & Boulevard Lofts on West Broad Street the weekend before and ridden the eastbound JRTC Route 6 bus down to Ninth and Broad, thirty-four-year-old Katie rolled down the center aisle of the Senate of Virginia in her compact SwiftChair.

Because the second-floor Senate Chamber had a level ground-accessible entrance off the Capitol elevator lobby and allowed a Senator's immediate family onto the floor specifically for the Opening Day swearing-in ceremony, Dad sat beaming in his best suit in the front row of the Senatorial family section while I rolled my SwiftChair right up beside Katie's desk holding our bound leather copy of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Up on the high marble rostrum, the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia—serving under the state constitution as President of the Senate—called the forty Senators-Elect forward to take the constitutional oath of office under Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of Virginia.

Rolling smoothly up the newly installed custom-milled mahogany ramp to the front well with me right beside her left armrest as her ceremonial guest, Katie didn't reach for a Bible while the opposition senators across the carpet held leather Bibles angled toward the press gallery cameras. Neither Katie nor I believed in any religion or any god, and just as she had done on the Virginia Beach City Council and in the House of Delegates, Katie placed her left palm squarely on the gold-stamped cover of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia resting across my hands, raised her right hand toward the rostrum, and spoke the secular constitutional affirmation under Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of Virginia and Section 49-9 of the Code of Virginia—omitting the optional parenthetical religious phrase at the end:

"I do solemnly affirm that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent upon me as a member of the Senate of Virginia, according to the best of my ability."

Ten minutes later, after I rolled back out to the accessible viewing bay to watch the formal floor proceedings alongside Dad, the Clerk read the standing committee assignments for the 2020 session and handed Senator Katie Prairie the polished wooden gavel as Madam Chair of the Senate Committee on Rehabilitation and Social Services—sitting right across the chamber from the exact seats where Senator Franklin Ward and his allies had killed her transit and disability bills twenty-two months earlier.

And just as we knew they would, the Republican caucus, right-wing cable networks, and evangelical media had an absolute field day over both what was resting under Katie's left hand and the four words she had deliberately left out of her oath.

Before the Senate had even gaveled out of its Opening Day ceremonial session at two-thirty that afternoon, an opposition party operative up in the press gallery had blasted out a zoomed-in video clip of Katie's left hand resting on the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia instead of a Bible while she said "I do solemnly affirm" and stopped at "according to the best of my ability" without saying "so help me God." Within forty-five minutes, the opposition party's state committee had sent out a breathless statewide fundraising email accusing the newly minted committee chair from Virginia Beach of "refusing to touch a Holy Bible or say 'So help me God' on the floor of Thomas Jefferson's Capitol." Conservative talk-radio switchboards from Richmond to Tidewater were melting down, right-wing cable pundits on Beacon News and LibertyMax were running red "WAR ON FAITH IN VIRGINIA" banners across the bottom of the screen, and back home in Virginia Beach—just five minutes down Indian River Road from our house in Kempsville—the televangelist hosts of The 777 Circle on the Covenant Broadcasting Network were interrupting their afternoon broadcast to warn viewers that their own hometown State Senator had "defied the sacred oath precedent set by George Washington in 1789."

When Katie, Dad, and I rolled out of the mahogany doors of the Senate Chamber into the Capitol Rotunda at two-forty-five, camera crews from Beacon News, LibertyMax, and the Covenant Broadcasting Network were waiting in ambush beside Thomas Jefferson's marble statue.

"Senator Prairie! Senator Prairie!" the Beacon News correspondent called out, thrusting a microphone toward Katie's lap tray alongside a reporter holding a Covenant Broadcasting Network mic flag while two opposition state senators lingered behind the marble columns to watch the ambush. "The Republican state chairman and the hosts of The 777 Circle back in your own district in Virginia Beach just condemned you for refusing to place your hand on a Holy Bible and refusing to say ‘So help me God’ during your Senate swearing-in today! Why did you break the precedent that President George Washington set at the founding of our country?”

Katie braked her SwiftChair on the black-and-white marble tiles beneath Thomas Jefferson’s statue, looked straight into the cluster of television lenses without a flicker of hesitation, and picked up the leather-bound volume off my lap tray so the gold seal of the Commonwealth gleamed under the camera lights.

“First of all, I would gladly encourage the hosts of The 777 Circle down on Indian River Road—and my Republican colleagues hiding behind those marble columns—to actually read the Constitution of the United States, the Constitution of Virginia, and a basic history book,” Katie answered, her voice calm, crisp, and loud enough to echo across the entire Capitol Rotunda. “Let’s start with the law. Article VI, Clause 3 of the United States Constitution states in black and white that all state legislators shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation to support the Constitution, and that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States. And right here in Article II, Section 7 of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia—the exact document I placed my left hand on today—the framers put the words ‘or affirm’ and ‘so help me God’ inside parentheses, paired with Section 49-9 of the Code of Virginia, specifically so citizens who do not subscribe to a religion can make a solemn, binding secular affirmation without being subjected to an unconstitutional religious test.”

The Covenant Broadcasting Network reporter opened his mouth to interrupt—“But George Washington himself added ‘So help me God’ in 1789—”

“No, he didn’t—and historians debunked that myth decades ago,” Katie cut in smoothly, her literal, encyclopedic memory firing on all cylinders as the cameras rolled live. “Even the Presidential Oath written by the Founders in Article II, Section 1, Clause 8 of the United States Constitution does not contain the words ‘So help me God.’ Not a single eyewitness, diary, newspaper, or foreign diplomat standing at Federal Hall in New York on April 30, 1789 recorded George Washington adding ‘So help me God’ to his oath. That story was invented out of thin air sixty-five years later in an 1854 book written by Rufus Wilmot Griswold, who wasn’t even born when Washington was alive, and the first President confirmed by contemporary historical records to have said those words was Chester A. Arthur in 1881. And look at whose marble statue we are gathered under right now: Thomas Jefferson, who wrote the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom right here in Richmond declaring that our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions.”

Behind the marble columns, the two opposition senators suddenly found something very interesting to look at on their shoes as Katie lowered the Constitution back onto my lap tray and added one final, unbothered smile for the cameras:

“In the Seventh Senate District across Virginia Beach and Norfolk, I represent Christians, Jews, Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists, and non-religious citizens like my brother and me alike. I wasn’t elected to be anybody’s pastor, and Virginia is a constitutional republic, not a theocracy. My legal obligation as a State Senator is to the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of Virginia—and if the pundits screaming on Beacon News, LibertyMax, and The 777 Circle spent half as much time reading the Constitution as they spend inventing phony history lessons about George Washington, maybe they'd know what Article VI actually says. Now if you'll excuse my brother, my dad, and me, we have a Route 6 bus to catch on Broad Street and a committee docket to gavel in tomorrow morning."

When we rolled into Katie's new Senate of Virginia office at eight-thirty the next morning and the main constituent telephone line rang on her desk before her legislative assistant had even finished hanging up her winter coat in the outer room, Katie didn't wait for staff to screen the call. Just as she had done as a Virginia Beach City Councilwoman and as a Virginia State Delegate—because in her literal autistic mind it was her office and it was only polite to answer the phone when she could so constituents knew she was actually at her desk working for them—she reached over from her SwiftChair, pressed the speakerphone button, and said warmly, "Senator Katie Prairie's office, this is Katie speaking," greeting a stunned retired Navy chaplain calling from Norfolk to thank her for defending Thomas Jefferson's Statute for Religious Freedom.

Down on the Senate floor, just like the House of Delegates across the Rotunda, the Senate of Virginia had its own official Senate Page Program for thirteen- and fourteen-year-old eighth-graders appointed from across the Commonwealth—and within forty-eight hours, Katie and I had become the favorite Senator and brother of the eighth-grade Senate Pages for the exact same reason the House Pages had gravitated to our desks four years earlier. Every floor errand from Senator Prairie's desk came on a neat, color-coded sticky note with the exact room number, committee name, and bill number written in clear block print, and nobody in Katie's orbit ever barked a vague instruction or raised their voice when the brass division bells rang.

As for our three favorite eighth-grade House Pages from February 2016—the autistic triplets Sam Hawkins and his identical-twin sisters Mandy and Sarah Hawkins from rural Southside Virginia near Danville, who had told us over sub sandwiches at the Oak Lawn Diner on West Broad Street after riding JRTC Route 6 that Katie was their absolute favorite constitutional officer in Richmond—they had aged out of the middle-school Page program years earlier, graduated together at the top of their high-school class under the loving roof of their Aunt Marge and their Uncle Richard Callaway (who had since retired as Republican House Majority Leader), and enrolled together that fall at age eighteen as freshmen at Central Virginia University right on the West Broad Street Route 6 bus corridor. True to her word on that winter afternoon four years earlier, the moment Sam, Mandy, and Sarah aged out of high school and arrived in Richmond for college, Katie hired all three triplets to work side by side in her Senate of Virginia office—first as paid legislative session and transit-policy interns throughout their four years at Central Virginia University, and then, the morning after all three graduated with honors in May 2024, as her full-time State Senate Legislative and Transit Policy Assistants.

The Accessibility Project: Riding Every Bus Across the Commonwealth for the United States Senate

Part 1: The Living Room Decision in Kempsville, The 10,000-Signature Rule, & The Accessibility Project

Date: 2026-01-10 at 19:30 America/New_York

Saturday, January 10, 2026, 7:30 PM — The Living Room Decision on Lord Nelson Drive & The 10,000-Signature Rule

“Listen to what Senator Martin Warren’s chief of staff just told the political desk at The Potomac Post,” I said, reading aloud from my MagnaBook Pro screen inside the warm living room of our brick ranch house on Lord Nelson Drive in Kempsville while the January rain tapped against the front bay window. “Gregory said, and I quote: ‘State Senator Katie Prairie and her brother are a cute regional novelty down in Tidewater, but two software developers in wheelchairs riding city buses cannot possibly raise the twenty million dollars required to compete against Preston Holloway in a statewide U.S. Senate primary.’”

Sitting on the sofa right beside my right armrest with his familiar yellow legal pad resting on his knee and a mug of black coffee in his hand, our sixty-seven-year-old dad let out a low, dry chuckle and looked across at my forty-year-old twin sister.

“A cute regional novelty,” Dad repeated, shaking his head behind his glasses. “That’s the fourth election in sixteen years where the party bosses in Richmond or Washington have called the two of you a long shot before a single voter has cast a ballot.”

Parked flush against my left armrest in her compact black-and-silver SwiftChair power wheelchair, Katie didn’t look intimidated in the slightest. Her blue eyes were fixed on the muted television screen across the living room, where three-term Democratic U.S. Senator Martin Warren stood at a crystal-chandeliered ballroom podium in McLean raising the arm of his handpicked successor—wealthy Northern Virginia venture capitalist businessman Preston Holloway, whose newly formed super PAC had already banked fourteen million dollars from K Street defense contractors, private-equity hospital chains, and prescription-drug middlemen.

And right below the split-screen video of the McLean donor reception, Global News Network was replaying a clip from the White House South Lawn two hours earlier, where President Garrett Thorne had stopped in front of the Marine One chopper blades to sneer into the press pool microphones about Virginia’s newly opened Senate seat.

“Did you hear what Garrett Thorne called you on the South Lawn this afternoon, Katie?” Dad asked quietly, his jaw tightening the way it always did whenever a bully came after his daughter. “He called you ‘Broken Katie Prairie rolling around Richmond’ and said if Democrats were crazy enough to nominate a spinster on wheels instead of a corporate suit, his Restore the Republic nominee Richard Sterling would bury you in November. And then Vice President Conrad Drayton went straight onto the Liberty First Network at six o’clock to say unmarried, childless, non-religious twins who live together have no stake in the future of the American family.”

Katie reached her right hand across our wheelchair armrests, laced her fingers tightly through mine, and turned her head to look at Dad and me.

Six winters had passed since Katie had rolled up the newly milled solid-mahogany ramp in the Senate of Virginia Chamber in January 2020 to take the gavel as Chair of Rehabilitation and Social Services. Across those six years—through the August 2020 pandemic special session inside the Central Virginia University Student Commons Ballroom on West Broad Street, where Katie had legislated behind a three-sided clear polycarbonate shield wearing a NIOSH-approved trifold N95 respirator fitted with an airtight medical drinking valve while I logged classroom and bus ventilation rates on our pocket NDIR carbon-dioxide monitor and wiped our SwiftChair joysticks down with non-alcoholic benzalkonium chloride and hypochlorous acid wipes—she had never missed a single roll-call vote or a single constituent phone call. She had won re-election overwhelmingly in the renumbered Twenty-Second Senate District in November 2023, and just yesterday afternoon at the Capitol in Richmond, she had co-patroned and cast her second-passage YES votes to place three historic Constitutional Amendments directly onto the November 3, 2026 statewide ballot: enshrining the fundamental Right to Reproductive Freedom, locking Marriage Equality into the Constitution of Virginia while repealing the defunct 2006 ban, and establishing automatic Restoration of Voting Rights upon completion of a prison term.

Yet every single morning when we opened the federal register, we watched the Restore the Republic administration in Washington—and their billionaire Apex Efficiency Commission—try to rip away the exact civil rights, Medicaid home-and-community-based disability waivers, rural hospitals, and Federal Transit Administration operating grants that working Virginians depended on to survive. And instead of fighting back with teeth, Senator Martin Warren's handpicked corporate heir Preston Holloway was going on cable television preaching polite, poll-tested incrementalism so he wouldn't offend his K Street donors.

"Martin Warren doesn't own that Senate seat, Dad," Katie said, her voice calm, steady, and ringing with the exact same crystalline resolve she had carried onto the four buses in 2008. "That seat belongs to the eight point seven million people of the Commonwealth of Virginia. Preston Holloway thinks he can buy the June primary from a ballroom in McLean without ever setting foot on a public bus, and Garrett Thorne and Conrad Drayton think calling me 'Broken Katie Prairie' is going to make Nate and me hide in our house. I want to beat Preston Holloway in the June sixteenth primary, I want to beat Richard Sterling on November third, and on January third, 2027, I want to roll down the aisle of the United States Senate and watch Vice President Conrad Drayton—in his constitutional capacity as President of the Senate—be forced to swear me in on the Constitution of the United States without a Bible and without saying 'So help me God.'"

I grinned across our armrests, feeling the familiar electric surge run straight through my ribs. "He is going to turn purple at the rostrum, Katie."

"Let him," Katie smiled, squeezing my hand before turning to Dad. "Are you two with me?"

Dad uncapped his black rollerball pen, tapped it against the top of his yellow legal pad, and wrote Katie Prairie for United States Senate — 2026 in neat, square block letters across the top margin.

"Every single mile, sweetheart," Dad said warmly. "Alright, Mr. Campaign Manager and Chief Technology Officer—walk your Treasurer through the statutory jump from a forty-district State Senate race to a statewide United States Senate campaign."

I tapped a shortcut on my MagnaBook Pro, pulling up the federal and state election code checklists I had spent the past forty-eight hours compiling in Quantum Code.

“First,” I said, “because the United States Senate is a federal office, our campaign finance reporting moves from Virginia’s state COMET system to the Federal Election Commission. Tonight we file FEC Form 2—Katie’s Statement of Candidacy—and FEC Form 1 registering Katie Prairie for U.S. Senate as her principal campaign committee, with you as official Campaign Treasurer and me as Campaign Manager and Chief Technology Officer, plus her mandatory Senate Public Financial Disclosure Report with the Secretary of the United States Senate. And because our campaign donations will process through CivicPulse and Meridian Pay behind Aegis Cloud on the PHP infrastructure we write and maintain ourselves, zero dollars are going to beltway fundraising consultants.”

“And what about getting Katie’s name onto the June sixteenth Democratic Primary ballot under Virginia law?” Dad asked, poised with his pen.

“That’s the biggest hurdle—and the exact reason the Washington insiders think we can’t do it without corporate money,” I replied, rotating my laptop slightly toward Dad’s side of the sofa so both he and Katie could read the statutory table. “When Katie ran for the House of Delegates, Code of Virginia Section 24.2-506 required one hundred and twenty-five voter signatures. When she ran for the Senate of Virginia, it required two hundred and fifty. To qualify for the statewide United States Senate primary ballot in Virginia, Section 24.2-506 requires at least ten thousand qualified voter signatures statewide—and there’s a mandatory geographic distribution rule: those ten thousand signatures must include at least four hundred qualified voters from each of Virginia’s eleven Congressional Districts.”

Dad whistled softly, jotting the numbers onto his legal pad. “Ten thousand verified signatures statewide, with a hard floor of four hundred in all eleven Congressional Districts—from Accomack County on the Eastern Shore and Virginia Beach here in the Second District all the way out to the Ninth District in Blacksburg, Bluewater, Abingdon, and Cumberland Gap.”

“Which means if our campaign standard is always collecting more than double the statutory minimum so no party lawyer can challenge us off the ballot,” Katie said, her blue eyes lighting up with mathematical focus, “we aren’t stopping at ten thousand signatures and four hundred per district. We’re collecting at least twenty-four thousand signatures statewide, and at least twelve hundred verified signatures in every single one of the eleven Congressional Districts.”

Just then, Katie’s smartphone buzzed on the coffee table beside our three tall glasses of ice-cold ginger ale. It was a Washington campaign consultant who had been leaving voicemails all afternoon offering to sign on as a paid strategist. When Katie tapped the speakerphone button and told him she was entering the race, the consultant immediately launched into a slick sales pitch offering to lease our campaign a forty-five-foot custom diesel motorcoach wrapped with a giant photograph of Katie’s face for forty-two thousand dollars a month.

Katie looked at me, looked at Dad, and leaned toward the speakerphone.

“Thank you for calling, but our campaign will not be leasing a private tour bus,” Katie told him crisply. “For the past sixteen years, my brother Nate, my dad, and I have ridden regular public transit buses and passenger trains everywhere we go, and we pay standard regular fare at the farebox alongside our constituents. If a rural county or a working-class corridor in Virginia has a public bus route, we are riding that bus with the people who live there. And if a rural county doesn’t have fixed-route bus service between towns, or if a wheelchair ramp breaks down in the rain, my dad is going to rent a wheelchair-accessible minivan to bridge the gap so I experience that exact transit desert the same way disabled and working-class Virginians do every day. Have a good evening."

She tapped the red disconnect button, and Dad raised his glass of ginger ale with a proud grin.

Saturday, January 10, 2026, 8:45 PM — Written Permission From The Paper Wall & The Brooks Family for "The Accessibility Project"

Forty-five minutes after we filed Katie's FEC Form 2 electronically, a chime sounded on my laptop as an incoming OmniMeet video call connected from the New River Valley.

When I clicked accept and angled my screen so Katie, Dad, and I could all see it clearly from our chairs, two joyful living rooms filled the split window at once.

On the left side of the screen, gathered inside the sunlit control room of Engine Room Records in Blacksburg alongside Holly O'Connell—the youngest O'Connell sister and longtime Day-to-Day Band Manager and General Counsel—sat the members of The Paper Wall: Julian Croft ("Leo"), Maya Sterling ("Olivia"), sisters Izzy ("Luna"), Bea ("Stella"), and Charlotte ("Charlie") Croft, and cousins Diana Hale, Ellie Cross, and Fiona Croft.

And on the right side of the screen, gathered inside the wide, oak-bumpered communal living room of the Brooks Family Compound along U.S. Route 11 between Christiansburg and Radford, sat the found family whom The Paper Wall's music had chronicled—centered around the original trio from Bennett Hall Room 214: thirty-year-old Jordan Shawn Kelly (clean-shaven, wearing his rectangular prescription glasses and behind-the-ear hearing aids, seated in his custom manual wheelchair with his Pinnacle Vanguard Pro laptop open to his dark-screened NeoEdit terminal on Aura Glade) flanked right beside his armrests by his wife Aubrie Jean Kelly and Madison Elizabeth Scott, along with their Room 216 and Constellation family: Zoë Wren Brooks, Lauren Nicole Barnes, Hannah Parker Anderson, Mark Shawn Anderson, Isabel Claire Dawson, Jessamine "Jess" Mercer, Daniel, Laura, and Megan Brooks, and Australian expats Sarah Kristyn Braithwaite and Jessica Gallagher.

"Senator Prairie! Nate! Mr. Prairie!" Aubrie Jean called out warmly, her long brown side-braid resting over her shoulder as she held up a freshly signed, notarized legal document beside Jordan's wheelchair while Holly O'Connell held up the matching Engine Room Records master licensing execution sheet in Blacksburg. "We just saw your FEC filing go live on the wire five minutes ago, and we wanted to be the very first people in the Commonwealth of Virginia to hand you this!"

On the right half of our screen, Zoë shared a high-resolution PDF onto our workspace: a permanent, royalty-free campaign synchronization and public-performance license for Track 13 of The Eleventh Child, Book 2: System.Restore —"The Accessibility Project"—signed in ink by every member of The Paper Wall, by Holly O'Connell on behalf of Engine Room Records, and by Jordan, Aubrie Jean, Madison, Zoë, Lauren, Hannah, Mark, Sarah, Jessica Gallagher, Isabel, Jessamine, and Daniel, Laura, and Megan Brooks.

Katie’s hand flew to her collar, her blue eyes shining as she looked at the twenty-plus signatures spanning both pages.

“You all signed this for our campaign?” Katie asked softly.

“Every single one of us,” Julian Croft smiled from Blacksburg, his arm around Maya’s shoulders while Izzy, Bea, and Charlie cheered behind them. “When we wrote and recorded ‘The Accessibility Project,’ we wanted it to sound like a triumphant mission briefing—turning accessibility mapping and disability solidarity into an unstoppable anthem. There isn’t a candidate in America that song belongs to more than you and Nate.”

Beside Aubrie Jean and Madison on the right side of the screen, Jordan’s fingers moved swiftly across the tactile keys of his Pinnacle Vanguard Pro laptop, and a moment later he triggered EchoType—filling our Kempsville living room with the warm, clear Australian female cadence of his signature “Sydney” voice profile:

Listen to the first verse of that song, Senator Prairie. Back in the spring of 2015, when the six of us from Suite 214 and 216 were undergraduate freshmen at Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute mapping the Hillside Pass-Through elevators at Eleanor Bennett Hall for our class project, the lyric in our song was: “We cannot pour the concrete for a ramp, we cannot buy an elevator for the camp—the budget’s zero, but the mission’s clear.” Back then, our budget really was zero. All we could do was draw the map and share the key.

Jordan smiled warmly behind his glasses as Aubrie Jean and Madison rested their hands on his shoulders and Daniel and Laura Brooks nodded proudly behind him. He typed another line and pressed the speak key:

Every single eligible Virginian voter in our family—Aubrie Jean, Madison, Zoë, Lauren, Hannah, Mark, Isabel, Jess, Daniel, Laura, Megan, and me—is voting for you in the June sixteenth Democratic Primary and again on November third. And even though Sarah and Jessica are Australian nationals who can’t cast a ballot yet, all of us are going to help you gather signatures and campaign across the New River Valley, Bluewater, and Southwest Virginia. Because when you roll onto the floor of the United States Senate and take your seat on the Senate Appropriations Committee, the budget won’t be zero anymore. You’re going to Washington to pour the concrete for the ramps and fund the elevators for the whole country.

Across our armrests, Katie squeezed my fingers so tightly I could feel her pulse beating against mine.

“When Nate, Dad, and I ride the bus up to Montgomery County and Carroll County this spring,” Katie promised them, her voice clear and steady, “‘The Accessibility Project’ is going to be playing from every speaker we bring—and we’ll meet the Room 214 crew right at the Route 3 bus shelter at the end of your driveway on Lee Highway.”

Part 2: The Jammed Ramp on Victoria Boulevard, ShoreLine Transit Across the Bay, & Wearing the NFA’s ‘F’ Grade in Fairfax

Date: 2026-03-28 at 10:15 America/New_York

Saturday, March 28, 2026, 10:15 AM — The Jammed Wheelchair Ramp in the Rain on Victoria Boulevard in Hampton

Caution: ramp is deploying! the exterior speaker of the twelve-year-old Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Route 103 bus crackled in the pouring March rain on Victoria Boulevard in Hampton—and then a harsh metallic grind echoed off the wet asphalt as the front flip-out aluminum wheelchair ramp seized halfway out of the threshold, sticking straight up at a forty-five-degree angle twelve inches above the flooded concrete curb.

Inside the open front doorway of the bus, the uniformed operator hit the hydraulic toggle switch twice more, winced as the worn actuator motor whined without budging an inch, and stepped out into the cold rain in his high-visibility vest.

“Oh, Senator Prairie, I am so sorry,” the operator said, kneeling on the wet sidewalk beside the jammed hinge plate as water dripped from the bill of his cap. “This coach has three hundred and eighty thousand miles on the chassis, and the shop has been waiting six weeks on replacement hydraulic actuators because the spare-parts budget is tapped out. Let me call dispatch for a road supervisor and a relief bus—it might take thirty-five or forty minutes in this weather.”

Parked side by side in our compact SwiftChairs in our rain slickers while Dad stood behind us holding a wide clear umbrella over our laptop bag and petition clipboards, forty-year-old Katie didn’t reach for a phone to summon a campaign car, and she didn’t get angry at the driver.

Instead, she looked at the seven working commuters waiting under the narrow aluminum shelter overhang on Victoria Boulevard—two pipefitters from Peninsula Shipbuilding & Drydock in Newport News still wearing their steel-toed boots after an overnight hull shift, three certified nursing assistants in damp scrubs heading to Hampton, and a retired Navy machinist with a cane—each of whom had already signed our Third Congressional District primary petitions five minutes earlier.

“You don’t owe us a single apology—you can’t drive a bus safely when Washington starves your maintenance shop of spare parts,” Katie told the operator warmly, rolling her SwiftChair two feet closer so he could step back under the dry overhang of the shelter. “Nate, Dad, and I aren’t going anywhere. If the riders on Victoria Boulevard have to wait forty minutes in the rain for a road supervisor with a pry bar, then the candidate asking to represent them in the United States Senate is waiting right here in the rain with them.”

I lifted my mPhone on its armrest mount and tapped the live broadcast button on StreamCast and The Grid.

For the next thirty-eight minutes, while the March downpour drummed against the shelter roof on Victoria Boulevard and Preston Holloway was up in Arlington hosting a two-thousand-dollar-a-plate brunch inside a Sovereign Regency hotel ballroom, forty-two thousand Virginians watched live on their phones as Katie sat in her wheelchair in the Hampton rain listening to shipyard workers and hospital aides explain what happens to an hourly worker’s paycheck when a twelve-year-old transit bus breaks down on the way to a shift. When the road supervisor’s pickup truck finally splashed up to the curb with a heavy steel pry bar and freed the corroded hinge pin so Katie and I could roll up into the front four-point securement bays, the entire bus broke into applause—and by the time we rolled down the ramp at the Newport News Transit Center, volunteers waiting at the bays had filled nineteen more petition sheets in a single hour.

That same week, Katie, Dad, and I rode every corridor across Eastern and Central Virginia to show voters what a truly connected Commonwealth looked like. In the First Congressional District, we rode the morning ARTS passenger train into the Williamsburg Transportation Center—the exact station where Katie had begun her five-bus escape from Brandon Mercer in November 2005—and rolled thirty yards across the brick plaza from the train platform to pay regular fare on the local CTTA Route 1 bus straight to the front gate of Brewster Gardens, proving to hospitality workers and car-free families that Virginia didn't need to waste millions on duplicative consultant studies when an existing train-to-bus connection was already running and simply needed evening frequency and public promotion.

Two days later, in the Second Congressional District, we experienced firsthand how Virginia's Eastern Shore was stranded on a public-transit island at both ends of U.S. Route 13: at the south end, CVTA Routes 1, 27, and 35 met at the Shore Drive and Pleasure House Road transfer point right at the southern foot of the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel, yet neither CVTA nor ShoreLine Transit ran a single public bus across the seventeen-point-six-mile span to Cape Charles; and at the north end in Accomack County, ShoreLine Transit stopped at Oak Hall and Chincoteague Junction just eleven miles short of the Maryland state line—stopping dead before Pocomoke City, Maryland, where Maryland Shore Transit connected north to Salisbury and Delaware's First State Transit network. So after riding CVTA Route 1 to the Shore Drive and Pleasure House Road transfer point at the foot of the bridge-tunnel, Dad met us with a rented silver side-entry wheelchair-accessible ramp minivan, secured our two SwiftChairs into the four-point floor tie-downs, and drove us across the Bridge-Tunnel to Cape Charles, where we boarded a ShoreLine Transit cutaway bus with a rear hydraulic lift and rode the entire length of Northampton and Accomack Counties up U.S. Route 13 through Eastville, Exmore, Onley, Accomac, and Oak Hall. Outside the processing plant at Eastern Shore Poultry at shift change, women in hairnets and rubber boots crowded around Katie's SwiftChair to sign her petitions as she pledged to fight on the Senate Appropriations Committee for dedicated federal interstate transit funds to close both gaps at once—running a permanent public bus connection from Cape Charles across the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel (where public transit buses were already classified under the Bridge-Tunnel District's Class 8 schedule at a nominal one-dollar toll per crossing) directly into the Pleasure House Road CVTA transfer point on Shore Drive with a mandatory statutory cross-honoring agreement so CVTA and ShoreLine Transit fares and passes would be honored seamlessly on both systems, and extending ShoreLine Transit north across the state line into Pocomoke City and Salisbury with a direct Delmarva corridor link to First State Transit in Delaware.

And when we rode the morning ARTS train from Norfolk up through Petersburg in the Fourth District and Richmond in the Fourth and First Districts—riding JRTC Route 6 down Broad Street with its familiar automated voice announcing "Route 6. Downtown. Welcome aboard JRTC!" and calling out every single cross street along the corridor—we continued north to inspect the rail diamond at Doswell Junction in the Seventh District, where the East-West mountain branch tracks crossed the North-South main line less than half a mile from the front gate of Old Dominion Adventure Park.

“Look how close those tracks run to the park entrance, Nate,” Katie said, pointing from the window of our ARTS Café Car as we sipped our complimentary ginger ales. “Thousands of teenagers and working families ride up here every summer for seasonal jobs, and there isn’t a single platform or bus shuttle off Interstate 95. When we build the East-West Commonwealth Rail Corridor linking Norfolk and Richmond through Doswell Junction to Charlottesville, Fishersville, Roanoke, Christiansburg, and Bristol, we’re putting a high-level ADA station right here at Doswell with a dedicated ramp shuttle straight to the gate.”

Tuesday, April 14, 2026, 1:30 PM — Wearing the National Firearms Association’s “F” Grade as a Badge of Honor in Fairfax

When we rolled off the Capital Transit Orange Line elevator in Northern Virginia two weeks later and boarded a local Fairfax Link bus across the Tenth, Eighth, and Eleventh Congressional Districts, our grassroots petition count had already surged past twenty-two thousand verified signatures—and the gun lobby decided it was time to try to scare Katie off the ballot.

At one o’clock that Tuesday afternoon inside their glass corporate headquarters in Fairfax, the National Firearms Association convened a press conference alongside Republican Senate nominee Richard Sterling to announce that they had just issued State Senator Katie Prairie a lifetime “F” rating—pointing to a viral town-hall clip from Alexandria where Katie had called the civilian MR-15 semiautomatic rifle a “weapon of war” and demanded universal background checks, federal extreme-risk red-flag laws, safe storage rules, and a ban on high-capacity magazines and assault weapons.

“Katie Prairie has no business representing Virginia in the United States Senate!” the NFA’s chief lobbyist barked into a bank of television microphones while holding up a red cardstock mailer stamped with a giant black letter F over a photograph of Katie in her wheelchair. “She got a lifetime F grade from the National Firearms Association, she calls America’s most popular rifle a weapon of war, she wants a government takeover of healthcare, she wants taxpayer-funded abortion on demand, and she led the charge in Richmond to put biological men in women’s sports and men in women’s restrooms!”

What the NFA lobbyist didn’t realize was that Katie, Dad, and I were riding the eastbound Fairfax Link bus right down the boulevard outside their building at that exact moment.

Hearing the live broadcast on my mPhone earpiece, Katie glanced up at the automated destination sign above the windshield, reached up from her SwiftChair, and pulled the yellow stop-request cord for the concrete bus shelter directly across the street from the NFA headquarters lawn.

When the bus knelt and deployed its front ramp at 1:28 PM, six television camera crews who were packing up their tripods on the sidewalk did a collective double-take as forty-one-year-old Katie Prairie and I rolled down the bus ramp side by side with Dad right behind us.

“Senator Prairie!” the GNN and Beacon News correspondents shouted, sprinting across the crosswalk with their cameramen as the NFA lobbyist and Richard Sterling froze on the headquarters steps behind them. “The National Firearms Association just gave you a lifetime F grade for calling the MR-15 a weapon of war, and Richard Sterling just attacked your record on healthcare, abortion, and transgender kids in schools! Do you regret calling the MR-15 a weapon of war?"

Katie braked her SwiftChair right beside the Fairfax Link bus stop sign, took one of the red NFA "F-Grade" mailers from a reporter's hand, and held it straight up beside her lapel so every lens had a crystal-clear shot.

"Regret it?" Katie's voice rang out across the Fairfax boulevard, fearless and unapologetic. "I wear this F grade from the National Firearms Association like a badge of honor! In fact, Nate, let's frame this right on the wall of our campaign headquarters when we get home to Kempsville! Unlike the lobbyists inside that building who cash checks from gun manufacturers, I served on the Virginia Beach City Council in the exact Municipal Center complex where twelve innocent public servants and citizens were murdered in Building 2 in May 2019, and I know the families who lost their loved ones at Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute in Blacksburg. I have zero problem calling an MR-15 what it is: a weapon of war designed to inflict maximum human carnage on a battlefield. Keeping weapons of war out of Virginia classrooms, college campuses, and grocery stores so our children come home alive from school matters a whole lot more to me than pleasing the gun lobby in Fairfax!"

"And what about Richard Sterling's attacks on healthcare, abortion, and his claim that you want men in women's sports and men in women's restrooms?" the Beacon News reporter pressed.

"Let's go down his list one by one, because unlike the politicians hiding on those steps, I don't need a pollster to tell me what I believe," Katie answered without missing a beat. "First: yes, I proudly champion universal healthcare for every single person in the United States of America, because no family should go bankrupt to pay for insulin, cancer treatment, or a power wheelchair! Second: abortion is a deeply personal, private medical decision strictly between a woman and her doctor—probably the hardest decision a woman ever has to make—and no politician, prosecutor, or senator belongs in that exam room, which is why Virginia voters are going to vote YES on Question 1 this November! And third: when Restore the Republic politicians scream their disgusting talking point that I 'want men in women's sports and men in women's restrooms,' they are bullying vulnerable transgender kids—who make up less than one percent of the population and just want to go to school safely—to distract working Virginians while they vote to gut your Medicare, your Medicaid waivers, and your public schools! Transgender women are women, transgender men are men, and as I told the Virginia House of Delegates back in 2016 when they tried to pass a fifty-dollar bathroom-police bill, no woman or girl in Virginia should ever have to pull her pants down for a government official just to use the ladies' room!"

Behind the camera line, a Fairfax County high-school teacher waiting at the bus shelter burst into applause, followed by a dozen office workers on the sidewalk who walked straight over to Dad's clipboard to sign Katie's Eleventh District petition sheets right in front of the stunned NFA officials.

Five days later, when Katie, Dad, and I rolled off the JRTC Route 6 bus at Capitol Square in Richmond to file our primary petitions at the Virginia State Board of Elections, we didn't turn in ten thousand signatures. We turned in twenty-four thousand, eight hundred and twelve verified voter signatures—with more than twelve hundred verified voters in every single one of Virginia's eleven Congressional Districts.

Part 3: The Roanoke Express, The Brooks Family Compound on Lee Highway, The Maroon Express to Bluewater, & Winning the June Primary

Date: 2026-05-18 at 11:30 America/New_York

Monday, May 18, 2026, 11:30 AM — Roanoke's Third Street Station, The RVT Roanoke Express, & The Brooks Family Compound on Lee Highway

"Watch how fast the unified validator reads the card, Dad," forty-one-year-old Katie smiled at eleven-thirty on Monday morning, May 18, 2026, as the three of us detrained from ARTS The Patriot at Roanoke's Third Street Station and rolled across the bus plaza to the waiting forty-five-foot Roanoke Valley Transit coach.

Because the passenger rail extension to Christiansburg Cambria Station on Depot Street NE wouldn't open for regular train service until the following year in 2027, Roanoke Valley Transit operated both the official ARTS Train Connector and The Roanoke Express out of Third Street Station—linking downtown Roanoke down Interstate 81 to the Christiansburg Transit Center at Falling Branch, New River Valley Mall, and the CPI Transit Center in Blacksburg.

As the operator deployed the coach lift and secured our two SwiftChairs in the front ADA bays, Katie, Dad, and I each tapped our blue-and-slate contactless Blue Ridge Go-Cards—printed with the regional slogan One Card. Three Systems. The Entire Valley.—against the electronic reader, deducting the standard three-dollar RVT Express fare with a crisp green beep.

Forty minutes later, our Roanoke Express coach glided off Interstate 81 at Exit 118 into the ground-level eight-bay bus terminal beneath VDOT's eight-level, six-thousand-space garage at the Christiansburg Transit Center at Falling Branch, exited directly onto the grade-separated buses-only flyover ramp onto the US-460 Bypass without touching a single local traffic light, made its intermediate regional stop at the New River Valley Mall Transit Center outside Hudson's and The Spot, and pulled into the multi-bay CPI Transit Center in Blacksburg at 12:30 PM.

For the next four hours, Katie, Dad, and I rode the entire New River Valley transit network alongside the students, faculty, and working families who used it every day.

Aboard a sixty-foot Prairie Coachworks articulated bus in the Mountain Mist and River Ribbon livery on Blue Ridge Transit Route 1—displaying 1 CBURG TRANS CTR and via S MAIN ST on its amber LED destination sign—we rolled down Progress Street NE in Blacksburg, where Ryan and Cassidy O'Connell, their twin cousins Evan and Tyler Wright, and their youngest sister Holly O'Connell were waiting at the Progress Street bus stop after ten o'clock in the morning to wave and hand Katie an insulated flask of cold ginger ale for the road. Continuing south down Business 460 into downtown Christiansburg to the Pepper Plaza Transit Center right next door to the Montgomery County Courthouse across from Pepper Street and ValueMart, we transferred onto a thirty-five-foot low-floor bus on BT Route 2 (The Christiansburg Local, displaying 2 NEW RIVER VALLEY MALL / via AQUATIC CTR & CAMBRIA). Rolling past the two Ironwood Collective apartment complexes on Wades Lane and turning down Mill Lane NE past the Blue Ridge Regional Aquatic Center onto Depot Street NE, we inspected the newly paved off-street bus loop on Depot Street NE at Christiansburg Cambria Station—where Katie recorded a campaign video pledging that when ARTS The Patriot passenger trains began pulling into Cambria Station in 2027, she would use her seat in the United States Senate to protect federal passenger rail and rural public transit funding all the way to Bristol.

After riding BT Route 4 east out Roanoke Street past the Exit 118C hotels and the Simmons Road NE deviation through the CPI Christiansburg Campus—universally called "the Law School" by every rider on the bus—out to the purpose-built VDOT sixty-foot turnaround loop at Woodland Drive, and taking a loop on 100-percent fare-free Radford Transit aboard The Radford Connector down Prices Fork Road and Peppers Ferry Road through Belview, Centerville, and Fairlawn across the New River Bridge into Radford's McConnell Transit Center, we boarded Blue Ridge Transit Route 3 (The Radford Link) heading west out of Pepper Plaza along U.S. Route 11.

Halfway between Christiansburg and Radford along Lee Highway, the Route 3 operator tapped his brakes for the privately funded, covered bus shelter sitting on the one-dollar perpetual public transit easement that Daniel Brooks had conveyed at the foot of his family's driveway back in 2014.

When the front ramp folded down onto the concrete pad and Katie, Dad, and I rolled up the heated, zero-grade brushed-concrete walkway onto the front porch, the front double doors swung wide open—and the real-life heroes of "The Accessibility Project" came out to meet us, led by the original trio from Bennett Hall Room 214.

Thirty-year-old Jordan Shawn Kelly rolled his custom manual chair straight up to Katie and me to shake our hands, wearing his rectangular prescription glasses and behind-the-ear hearing aids, flanked on either side by his wife Aubrie Jean Kelly and Madison Elizabeth Scott, along with Zoë Wren Brooks, Lauren Nicole Barnes, Hannah Parker Anderson, Mark Shawn Anderson, Isabel Claire Dawson, Jessamine "Jess" Mercer, Sarah Kristyn Braithwaite, Jessica Gallagher, and Daniel, Laura, and Megan Brooks—every single one of them wearing royal-blue Katie Prairie for U.S. Senate lapel buttons.

Rolling side by side down the sweeping forty-eight-inch hallways lined with recessed oak wall bumpers and through the zero-threshold pocket doors into the communal kitchen—where dual-height islands let Jordan, Katie, and me roll right underneath the counter beside Laura, Aubrie Jean, and Madison—Katie looked around the room in quiet awe.

"We've spent twenty-five years designing our own living spaces around our wheelchairs," Katie said warmly, looking from the heated concrete bus-stop walkway outside to the dual-height kitchen islands and the first-floor grandparents' suite. "Rolling off a regular fixed-route Route 3 bus on Lee Highway straight into a house built like this feels like seeing the exact future we're fighting for."

Beside us at the accessible island, Jordan tapped a sentence into NeoEdit on his Pinnacle Vanguard Pro laptop and triggered EchoType's warm "Sydney" voice:

When Daniel and Laura built this compound on Lee Highway, they proved that universal design isn't a medical burden—it's what makes a home belong to everyone. Now let's go show the rest of Virginia.

"And we've already registered over fourteen hundred new student voters across CPI and Radford University for the June sixteenth primary," Zoë added, pulling up her tablet angled toward her eyes to read off the campus precinct tallies she, Aubrie Jean, and Mark had organized with the student disability union at Callahan Hall. "Preston Holloway's campaign sent a surrogate to Blacksburg last week who parked in a hundred-and-fifty-dollar VIP lot and left after twenty minutes. Meanwhile, every student on the Route 1 articulated buses and the Radford Connector knows you and Nate actually ride the bus and play our song at every stop."

"And speaking of buses," thirty-year-old Madison Elizabeth Scott smiled, tapping the Blue Ridge Go-Card clipped to her lanyard as Aubrie Jean and Jordan grinned beside her, "the three of us from Room 214 are riding down to Carroll County with you today! Bluewater is my hometown—and the Bluewater Bunker where my parents, my brother Bob, and my cousin Emily live is forty-five minutes down Interstate 81 and Interstate 77 from here. The next southbound Maroon Express pulls into the Christiansburg Transit Center at 1:55 PM. Ready to go show Bluewater what a real Senator looks like?"

Monday, May 18, 2026, 2:30 PM — Riding Bluewater Transit's Maroon Express Into Bluewater With the Room 214 Crew & Winning the June 16 Primary

Bluewater Transit Maroon Express to Bluewater Transit Center via Christiansburg Transit Center, the exterior ADA speaker of the gleaming forty-five-foot Sainte-Claire 45H3 over-the-road highway coach announced at the Christiansburg Transit Center bay while its two-screen amber LED sign alternated between MAROON EXPRESS and BLUEWATER EXP via CBURG TC.

Unlike the low-floor city transit buses on Blue Ridge Transit, Bluewater Transit's Maroon Express highway coaches were equipped with heavy-duty mid-coach hydraulic ADA wheelchair lifts mounted above the under-floor luggage bays and expanded multi-bay wheelchair securement rows inside the cabin. With the entire Room 214 trio—Jordan, Aubrie Jean, and Madison—riding right alongside us and Dad tapping our Blue Ridge Go-Cards for the five-dollar Express fare, Katie, Jordan, and I rode the hydraulic platform up into the coach cabin, locked into the floor tie-downs, and watched the Blue Ridge mountains rise outside the tinted coach windows as we cruised south down Interstate 81 past the Dublin Park and Ride at Justin's Station (Exit 98) and the Max Meadows Park and Ride (Exit 84), turned south onto Interstate 77 up the mountain grade past the Bluewater Park and Ride at Exit 14 (where the coach's GPS automatically dropped the Go-Card validator to one-dollar local mode for the final hop into town), and rolled into the Bluewater Transit Center at 2:35 PM.

Directly across the street stood Bluewater High School—and five minutes earlier, at 2:30 PM on the dot, the final dismissal bell had rung.

As the operator lowered Katie, Jordan, and me down the mid-coach hydraulic lift onto the sunny concrete transit plaza beside Aubrie Jean, Madison, and Dad, hundreds of high-school students, teachers, cafeteria workers, and parents were pouring across the crosswalk into the transit center for the 2:45 PM clockface pulse—where Madison's parents David and Diane Scott, her younger brother Bob in his wheelchair, and her cousin Emily were waiting by the shelter to wave and cheer us in. Surrounding the bays stood Bluewater Transit's twenty-nine-foot and thirty-five-foot low-floor buses waiting to depart in every direction across the Blue Ridge plateau: the hourly Purple Line heading west on US-58 and US-221 to Galax Community College; the Gold Line heading northeast up US-221 through Dugspur and Willis to the Floyd County Courthouse (where riders connected down State Route 8 to Riner and BT Route 8); the Emerald Line heading east on US-58 across the Blue Ridge Parkway at Meadows of Dan and down scenic Lovers Leap into Stuart and the Martinsville Transit Center (where riders transferred directly onto Piedmont Regional Transit to Danville); the Silver Line heading south down US-52 and Interstate 77 past Fancy Gap to the state-line transfer hub; and a thirty-five-foot low-floor Mountain Empire Transit Highlands Express coach waiting to carry riders west toward Wytheville, Marion, Abingdon, and Bristol.

"People in Washington look at a county map of Southwest Virginia and write Carroll County off as deep-red Restore the Republic territory without ever setting foot here," Madison told Katie and me proudly as she, Aubrie Jean, and Jordan greeted Bluewater High School teachers, working parents, and Galax Community College nursing students who gathered around our three wheelchairs on the plaza while "The Accessibility Project" played crisp and bright from our portable speaker. "What the out-of-town pundits never understand is that Bluewater is the largest incorporated town in the entire Commonwealth of Virginia—solely because the voters here in Bluewater have always refused to break away from Carroll County and become an independent city! If Bluewater were an independent city like Galax or Radford, it would show up as a solid Democratic blue circle on every election map in America."

Right there in front of the Maroon Express coach during the 2:45 PM pulse—with Katie, Jordan, and me parked side by side in our wheelchairs and Aubrie Jean and Madison handing out campaign literature and voter-registration clipboards beside Dad—Katie spent an hour talking eye-to-eye with Carroll County voters before we boarded Bluewater Transit's Emerald Line east across Lovers Leap through Meadows of Dan and Stuart into the Martinsville Transit Center and transferred onto Piedmont Regional Transit eastbound along U.S. Route 58 into Danville.

Waiting for our bus under the Danville transfer shelter—surrounded by television camera crews from Roanoke, Lynchburg, and Danville who had gotten word an hour earlier that a political bombshell was about to drop—were twenty-four-year-old Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins, our three favorite autistic House Pages from February 2016 whom Katie had hired onto her Senate of Virginia staff as soon as they enrolled at Central Virginia University, standing side by side with their Aunt Marge Callaway and their maternal uncle, retired Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway.

For more than two decades in the Virginia House of Delegates—culminating in his years wielding the floor gavel in Richmond as Republican House Majority Leader—Richard Callaway had been a household name in Virginia politics and the undisputed conservative lion of Southside Virginia. Every county sheriff, poultry and tobacco farmer, small-business owner, and civic club from Martinsville and Danville to South Boston knew Richard by his first name. As the Piedmont Regional Transit operator lowered the front hydraulic ramp and Katie, Jordan, and I rolled down onto the Danville sidewalk beside Dad, Aubrie Jean, and Madison, Uncle Richard stepped forward in his navy blazer, shook Dad's hand and mine, leaned down to hug Katie warmly, and peeled the paper backing off a royal-blue Katie Prairie for U.S. Senate sticker—pressing it squarely onto his left lapel right in front of the rolling television cameras.

An audible gasp rippled through the cluster of Roanoke and Danville political reporters as Uncle Richard stepped up to the microphone stand with Aunt Marge and the triplets standing directly behind Katie's SwiftChair.

"Everybody along Route 58 knows I served twenty-four years in the House of Delegates as a conservative Republican, and that I had the honor of serving as your Republican House Majority Leader in Richmond," Uncle Richard said, his steady Southside baritone carrying across the entire transit plaza. "Marge and I don't agree with State Senator Katie Prairie on every partisan roll-call vote, and Katie has never once asked us to. Eleven years ago, after Marge and I took legal custody of our thirteen-year-old autistic triplet nephew and nieces—Sam, Mandy, and Sarah—after they survived unspeakable abuse, our kids went up to Richmond to serve as eighth-grade House Pages. When a loud, crowded corridor in the General Assembly Building overwhelmed our kids during their first week on the job, it wasn't the loudmouth politicians preening on cable television about family values who stopped to protect them. It was Katie Prairie and her twin brother Nate, who parked their two wheelchairs around our kids like a shield, sat with them at eye level until their breathing steadied, and rode the Route 6 city bus with our whole family to supper on Broad Street."

Uncle Richard rested a proud hand on Sam's shoulder while Aunt Marge squeezed Mandy's and Sarah's hands.

"Four years later, the day Sam, Mandy, and Sarah graduated high school right here in Southside and started college at Central Virginia University, Senator Katie Prairie kept her promise and hired all three of them to work side by side in her Senate office so they would never be separated," Uncle Richard continued, pointing back toward the Piedmont Regional Transit bus idling at the curb. "And that bus sitting behind us—connecting Martinsville and Danville—is running down Route 58 today because Katie Prairie took a transit bill that three eighth-grade Pages from Southside wrote for their Mock Session ten years ago and fought in the Senate of Virginia until it was funded into law. So when Washington consultants for Preston Holloway or Richard Sterling roll through Southside in chartered luxury buses telling you that Katie Prairie can't win rural voters or doesn't care about families, don't buy a word of it. Marge and I are crossing party lines to endorse Katie Prairie for the United States Senate—because for ten years, Katie Prairie has had our family's back."

In the front row of the press scrum, a Roanoke political correspondent thrust his microphone forward, almost tripping over his own camera cable.

"Leader Callaway, are you leaving the Republican Party?" the reporter shouted.

"No," Uncle Richard answered flatly.

"But you're endorsing the Democratic nominee for the United States Senate!"

"I am."

"How do you reconcile those two things after twenty-four years as a Republican in the House of Delegates?"

Uncle Richard looked straight into the cluster of television lenses, his jaw set with the quiet granite authority of a man who had counted votes and governed a real legislative chamber for nearly a quarter of a century.

“I didn’t leave the Republican Party. The Republican Party left me,” Uncle Richard said, and you could hear every camera shutter on the sidewalk freeze. “The people of Danville and Southside Virginia didn’t send me to Richmond for twenty-four years to serve a President, and they didn’t send me there to serve the Republican Party. They sent me there to serve them. They didn’t elect me because they wanted to watch Republicans and Democrats scream at each other on cable television—they sent me there to solve problems, pass budgets, maintain our roads and bridges, fund our schools, support our farmers and small businesses, and make sure the Commonwealth of Virginia still functions tomorrow morning. Twenty-four years in Richmond teaches you that ideological speeches don’t fill potholes. Sometimes solving problems meant working with Republicans, and sometimes it meant working with Democrats—and one of those Democrats was Katie Prairie.”

Uncle Richard glanced down at my sister with a dry, affectionate glint in his eye.

“Katie and I disagreed plenty—if she tells you otherwise, don’t believe her,” Richard added, making Katie laugh aloud from her SwiftChair along with the entire crowd at the bus shelter. “But I never once doubted that she came to Richmond for the exact same reason I did: to do the work. Ten years ago on the floor of the House of Delegates, when one of my own members brought a badly drafted bathroom bill onto the calendar and tried to call Katie out of order for asking how the Commonwealth was supposed to enforce it, I stood up as Republican Majority Leader and told the Speaker that the Gentlewoman from Virginia Beach didn’t introduce anatomy into the legislation—the bill did. Because I learned the hard way in Richmond that when Katie Prairie reads a bill line by line and says there is a problem with how it actually works, you had better hear her out before assuming she’s wrong. I’ve supported Republican Presidents, I’ve opposed Democratic Presidents, and I’ve probably been angry at every Governor Virginia has had at least once. That’s politics. Nobody elected me to swear personal allegiance to another politician. First the Liberty Tax Movement came along and started screaming that any conservative who compromised to pass a budget was a traitor to be primaried. And then Restore the Republic took over and inverted everything our party ever stood for—replacing principles with a single loyalty test to Garrett Thorne. I’ll tell you right here on camera: before 2016, I had never voted for a Democratic candidate in my entire life. Not once. Then Garrett Thorne came down that escalator, mocked disabled Americans on a stage, and demanded personal fealty above the Constitution. In 2016, in 2020, and in 2024, Marge and I voted for the Democrat at the top of the presidential ballot—not because those were votes for the Democrat, but because Garrett Thorne’s name was on the ballot and I refused to put that man in the White House. Back then, I still told myself it was just one man at the top of the ticket. And for a man who spent twenty-four years working inside a Capitol alongside clerks, custodians, Capitol Police officers, and thirteen-year-old Pages like my own kids, watching a mob attack the United States Capitol on January sixth while lawmakers and teenaged Pages were locked inside carrying out a constitutional duty was the day I knew that movement had nothing to do with conservatism. Then came our Virginia Governor’s race last November, in 2025. Garrett Thorne’s name wasn’t on the ballot in 2025—that was an election for Governor of the Commonwealth I spent twenty-four years serving. The Governor of Virginia should answer to the People of the Commonwealth of Virginia, not to President Garrett Thorne! Walking into my Danville precinct and voting against the Republican nominee for Governor of Virginia was the hardest ballot I ever cast, and the first one that truly crossed the Rubicon for me—because when our statewide nominee aligned with Thorne and promised to answer to the White House instead of the People of the Commonwealth of Virginia, I realized this sickness wasn't just one man in Washington anymore. Any candidate who aligns themselves with Garrett Thorne has to learn at the ballot box that Virginia does not belong to him. Now Restore the Republic calls me a RINO and an 'Enemy of the Republic' because I refuse to pledge personal fealty to Garrett Thorne—when the whole point of a constitutional republic is that no citizen owes personal loyalty to a President in the first place! And when they call Katie Prairie an enemy of the Republic, I ask them one simple question: Have you ever actually worked with her? No? I have. No Super PAC commercial can tell me she hates families when I've watched her take care of my kids for ten years, and no cable pundit can tell me she hates rural Virginia when she listened to three thirteen-year-olds from Danville talk about public transportation. In 2016, 2020, and 2024, I voted against Garrett Thorne himself. In 2025, I voted against a Republican candidate for Governor to send a message that aligning yourself with Garrett Thorne costs you Virginia. And this year is different again—because this year, I am not just voting against Thorne or his movement in the privacy of a voting booth. I am standing here in broad daylight voting wholeheartedly for Katie Prairie. I'm still a Republican. Katie's still a Democrat. I haven't changed parties. I've simply reached an age where I don't need anybody's permission to recognize a good public servant."

On the evening bus ride back up U.S. Route 58 toward Bluewater to catch the northbound Maroon Express—while video of the former Republican House Majority Leader declaring "I didn't leave the Republican Party; the Republican Party left me" at a Danville bus shelter led every six o'clock television newscast from Roanoke to Norfolk and Washington—Sam, Mandy, and Sarah watched our rural Southside traffic and voter-pledge numbers vertical-spike on my laptop screen and grinned in unison, coining a phrase that every political desk in Virginia would be repeating by November: "the Uncle Richard Effect."

Four weeks later—on Primary Night, Tuesday, June 16, 2026—the political establishment in Washington and Richmond learned the hard way what happens when you dismiss the people who ride the bus.

Despite retiring Senator Martin Warren's handpicked corporate candidate Preston Holloway spending fourteen million dollars in Super PAC television ads, voters across all eleven Congressional Districts—powered by historic turnout in Hampton Roads, Richmond, the CPI and Radford corridors, Bluewater, Charlottesville, and working-class neighborhoods across Northern Virginia—delivered a seismic upset.

At 8:19 PM, the GNN Decision Desk called the Democratic Primary for State Senator Katie Prairie by an eleven-point landslide: fifty-five point six percent to forty-four point four percent.

Part 4: Riding Into Deep-Red RTR Country: Mountain Empire Transit, The Coalfields, & Cumberland Gap With Dad

Date: 2026-07-24 at 09:30 America/New_York

Friday, July 24, 2026, 9:30 AM — Speaking Directly to RTR Voters Aboard Mountain Empire Transit & Cumberland Coalfield Transit

“I’ll be honest with you, Senator Prairie—I voted for Garrett Thorne twice, and I haven’t seen a Democratic candidate for the United States Senate set foot on a bus out here west of Wytheville in thirty years,” the sixty-six-year-old retired coal miner in the faded denim work shirt said across the aisle of the Mountain Empire Transit Highlands Express bus as we rolled west through Smyth County between Marion and Abingdon at nine-thirty on Friday morning, July 24, 2026.

Seated right beside him on the perimeter bench was a thirty-four-year-old rural clinic nurse in navy scrubs heading to her shift at Appalachian Mountain Health, while across the aisle our sixty-eight-year-old dad sat with his yellow legal pad resting on his knee and our New River Valley volunteers Lauren Nicole Barnes and Hannah Parker Anderson sat one row back wearing their royal-blue Katie Prairie for U.S. Senate buttons.

Outside the bus windows along Interstate 81 and old Lee Highway, huge red-white-and-blue Thorne / Drayton — Restore the Republic barn signs and Richard Sterling for U.S. Senate banners dotted the pasture fences across the Ninth Congressional District—counties where Restore the Republic candidates routinely won seventy to eighty percent of the vote, and where Washington party consultants had begged Katie not to waste a single day of her summer schedule.

Instead, Katie had insisted on riding the entire Southwest Virginia transit spine: taking Bluewater Transit’s Maroon Express to the Max Meadows Park and Ride at Exit 84, transferring with our Blue Ridge Go-Cards onto Mountain Empire Transit’s Highlands Express through Wytheville, Marion, Abingdon, and Bristol Union Station, and then boarding Cumberland Coalfield Transit cutaway buses equipped with rear hydraulic Elevate-U wheelchair lifts up US-23 and US-58A through Big Stone Gap, Powell Valley Community College, Norton, Commonwealth College at Wise, Clintwood in Dickenson County, and Grundy in Buchanan County.

“The consultants in Washington told me not to come out here because they look at a spreadsheet instead of looking at people,” forty-one-year-old Katie told the retired miner warmly from her SwiftChair, her left hand resting in mine across our armrests as the bus climbed the mountain grade toward Abingdon. “If I ask to represent the Commonwealth of Virginia in the United States Senate, I don’t just represent the cities that vote sixty-five percent Democratic—I represent every single town, hollow, and bus route in all ninety-five counties and thirty-eight independent cities. Ask me anything on your mind, sir.”

The retired miner nodded slowly, resting his calloused hands on the handle of his cane.

“Alright then,” he said. “Every night on Beacon News and LibertyMax, Richard Sterling and Conrad Drayton run commercials saying you got an F grade from the National Firearms Association for calling an MR-15 a weapon of war, that you want a government takeover of healthcare, that you support unrestricted abortion, and that you want biological men in women’s sports and men in women’s restrooms. Out here in the mountains, people hunt, people go to church, and people worry about what’s changing. Why should a working family in Smyth County or Wise County give you the time of day?”

Inside the quiet bus cabin, every passenger within five rows leaned in to listen. Katie didn't hedge a single word or change a single syllable from what she said in Virginia Beach or Fairfax.

"Because I respect you enough to tell you the exact truth to your face instead of lying to you to pick your pocket," Katie answered, looking him straight in the eye. "Let's start with guns. My granddad and plenty of my constituents hunt deer and turkey in Virginia. Not a single bill I have ever supported touches a hunter's shotgun or bolt-action deer rifle. What I called a weapon of war—and what got me that F grade from the National Firearms Association up in Fairfax, which I wear as a badge of honor—is the MR-15 high-velocity semiautomatic rifle with a thirty-round magazine that was used to slaughter twelve people in the Virginia Beach Municipal Center where I served on City Council. You know the difference between a deer rifle and a battlefield weapon, and keeping weapons of war out of our children's classrooms so grandkids come home alive from school is common sense."

The clinic nurse in the navy scrubs nodded firmly beside the miner.

"Second, let's talk about universal healthcare and abortion," Katie continued. "Right here in Southwest Virginia, Appalachian Mountain Health has closed rural maternity wards and emergency rooms while private health-insurance CEOs cash thirty-million-dollar bonus checks and Appalachian Electric Grid hikes your winter electric bill by forty dollars a month. When a pregnant mother in Wise County or Lee County has to drive ninety minutes over a mountain in winter just to reach an obstetrician, or when a woman faces the most heartbreaking medical complication of her life, that decision belongs strictly between a woman and her doctor—never a politician in Washington or Richmond. And when a retired coal miner with black lung or a diabetic bus rider gets denied a prescription or a wheelchair repair by an insurance bureaucrat, that's why I fight for universal healthcare—so healthcare is a basic human right for every American from Virginia Beach to Big Stone Gap."

Katie leaned forward an inch in her SwiftChair, her voice dropping to an earnest, unmistakable intensity.

"And finally, let's talk about why Richard Sterling and Conrad Drayton spend millions of dollars screaming on television that I 'want men in women's sports and men in women's restrooms,'" Katie said. "My twin brother Nate and I have used these power wheelchairs since the third Friday of September 2001, when we were sixteen-year-old juniors in high school. We know what it feels like to be stared at, mocked by the President of the United States as 'Broken Katie Prairie,' and locked out of buildings just for existing in the bodies we were born with. Transgender kids make up less than one percent of the population, and all they want is to go to school and live their lives without grown politicians bullying them or hiring bathroom police. The Restore the Republic billionaires scream about transgender kids every night on cable news for one reason: they hope that if they keep you angry enough at a sixteen-year-old kid you've never met, you won't notice Richard Sterling and Conrad Drayton voting to cut eight hundred billion dollars out of Medicaid, rural hospitals, and black-lung disability clinics!"

The retired miner stared at Katie for three full seconds—and then a slow, genuine grin broke across his weathered face.

"Well, I'll be damned," he said, reaching into his shirt pocket for his pen and gesturing toward Dad's yellow legal pad. "My brother-in-law has been waiting fourteen months on a Medicaid waiver for his wheelchair ramp in Norton while our hospital cut its night shift. Give me one of those campaign bumper stickers, Mr. Prairie—anybody who rides the morning bus into Smyth County and talks that straight has my vote."

Saturday, July 25, 2026, 2:15 PM — Bridging the Transit Gap in Dad's Rented Wheelchair Van to Cumberland Gap

"Look right there on the bronze plaque, fifth name from the top—Silas Prairie, 1775," Dad said quietly, resting one hand on Katie's shoulder and one hand on mine as the three of us looked out from the paved, accessible cliffside trail at the Pinnacle Overlook of Cumberland Gap National Historical Park at 2,440 feet of elevation.

The afternoon before in Big Stone Gap, after we had ridden a Cumberland Coalfield Transit cutaway bus to Powell Valley Community College and held a standing-room-only town hall where retired coal miners with oxygen tanks and union rail workers lined up alongside our SwiftChairs while "The Accessibility Project" echoed through the auditorium, we had reached the westernmost edge of fixed-route public transit in Lee County. Forty miles of winding mountain highway still lay between Big Stone Gap and the western tip of the Commonwealth of Virginia at Cumberland Gap—and just as Katie had promised in our living room in January, whenever there was a gap in public transit connections across rural Virginia, Dad bridged it himself. At eight o'clock that morning in Norton, Dad had rented a silver side-entry wheelchair-accessible minivan equipped with a fold-out aluminum floor ramp and dual four-point floor tie-downs in the removed middle row, driving Katie and me west down U.S. Route 58 through Jonesville and Rose Hill all the way to the mountain pass where Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee met beneath the summer clouds.

"Two hundred and fifty-one years ago, Silas Prairie helped cut a path through this mountain pass so families could cross into a new frontier," Dad said, his voice warm with pride as he looked out across the endless green ridges of the Appalachian Mountains stretching back toward the Shenandoah and the Atlantic coast. "And today his forty-one-year-old twin descendants rolled all the way from the Atlantic Ocean at Virginia Beach to the westernmost tip of Virginia to make sure nobody ever gets left behind at the curb."

Part 5: Katie's Favorite Place in Virginia: The Cassini Center in Highland County & The October WHRC TV-15 Three-Bus Sprint

Date: 2026-09-19 at 16:30 America/New_York

Saturday, September 19, 2026, 4:30 PM — Past Fishersville on Shenandoah Valley Transit & Over Shenandoah Mountain to The Cassini Center in Palo Alto

"Look out the right window, Katie—there's Barton Hall and the front gate on Roosevelt Avenue," I murmured on Saturday morning, September 19, 2026, as our Shenandoah Valley Transit Route 250 Connector bus rolled through Fishersville between Waynesboro and Staunton in Augusta County.

Nineteen and a half years had passed since Sunday, March 18, 2007, when Dad had packed up our rooms at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center after our twelve unforgettable days as twenty-one-year-old Web Applications Developer students—twelve days in which we had rushed a two-week Vocational Evaluation in a single week after an evaluator suggested training us as Waynesboro ValueMart door greeters, refused to let staff grab our wheelchair push-handles without consent, stayed stuck on Level 2 in Barton Hall because we refused to be separated, got caught sleeping in our street clothes inside a locked seasonal storage closet on Tuesday night after a male client broke Katie's nose and tore her swimsuit top in the therapeutic pool, and rolled out with our friend Tina after watching the administration sweep that same male client's horrific Wednesday-night assault of our sweet dorm neighbor Natalie under the rug.

When the Route 250 Connector stopped at the Fishersville shelter outside the gates, four current disabled vocational students in power wheelchairs boarded the bus, recognized Katie immediately from her campaign commercials, and spent the twenty-minute ride into Staunton telling her how much it meant to see someone in a SwiftChair running for the United States Senate.

At the Staunton transit hub, fixed-route public bus service ended at the eastern foot of the Allegheny Mountains. West of Staunton lay forty-two miles of steep, winding mountain switchbacks up U.S. Route 250 across the George Washington National Forest, climbing over the crests of Calfpasture Mountain, Shenandoah Mountain, and Bullpasture Mountain into Highland County—Virginia's highest-elevation, least-populous mountain county, nicknamed Virginia's Little Switzerland.

So at one-thirty that afternoon in Staunton, Dad picked up the keys to another rented silver side-entry wheelchair-accessible ramp minivan, secured Katie and me side by side into the four-point floor tie-downs in the center cabin, and drove us west over the 3,000-foot summit of Shenandoah Mountain before turning north onto Cowpasture Road N—Route 614—into the quiet mountain hollow of Palo Alto, Highland County.

And at four-thirty that afternoon, we rolled down the minivan ramp onto the grounds of The Cassini Center for Space Exploration for the very first time.

Waiting for us on the forty-eight-inch-wide, ultra-smooth zero-threshold polished concrete arrival plaza beneath the timber-and-stone mountain pavilion was forty-five-year-old Valerie Anne Miller—and parked right beside her in their three custom-molded, high-back tilt-in-space wheelchairs were her forty-one-year-old non-verbal autistic triplet cousins: Lyra Carina Starling, Orion Rigel Starling, and Celeste Callisto Starling.

Born in the autumn of 1985—just months after Katie and I were born in April 1985—Lyra, Orion, and Celeste were the exact same age as the two of us.

Years earlier, after realizing that standard crowded science museums with glaring fluorescent lights, roaring echoes, stepped planetarium seats, and high-mounted telescope eyepieces locked her triplet cousins out of the cosmos they loved, Valerie had dedicated her life and her family's Palo Alto mountain sanctuary to building a world-class astrophysics and dark-sky observatory engineered from the ground up around her cousins' three wheelchairs and autistic sensory needs.

“Welcome to Palo Alto, Senator Prairie, Nate, and Mr. Prairie!” Valerie beamed, greeting my sister by her sitting State Senate title as she stepped forward to shake Dad’s hand while Lyra, Orion, and Celeste offered joyful, rhythmic hand-flaps and soft welcoming vocalizations from their chairs. “The triplets have been watching your bus videos on our tablet all summer—when I told them this morning that forty-one-year-old twins who use wheelchairs and love space were coming up the mountain to visit them for the first time, Orion tapped his communication switch for ‘Saturn’ six times in a row!”

Katie rolled her SwiftChair right up beside Lyra’s and Celeste’s armrests while I rolled up beside Orion’s, and over the next four hours—as Katie saw firsthand what Valerie and the triplets had built for the children and families of the Commonwealth—the Cassini Center became my sister’s absolute favorite place in all of Virginia.

Rolling five chairs abreast down the seamless, zero-threshold hallways lit by warm, indirect amber path LEDs with zero harsh overhead glare and whisper-quiet acoustic timber baffling, Valerie led us first into The Starlight Wing and The Cassini Experience. Instead of vertical glass cases hung at standing eye level, the gallery’s six-foot-wide backlit ultra-high-resolution cosmic tables were mounted horizontally at an exact thirty-four-inch height with thirty inches of open knee and footplate clearance underneath—allowing Katie, me, Lyra, Orion, and Celeste to roll our wheelchairs flush around the glowing edge of the Andromeda Galaxy and the Pillars of Creation and look straight down into billions of stars without craning our necks.

Next, we rolled into The Tranquility Dome—the Cassini Center’s planetarium, built with a completely flat, level-entry floor, zero stepped concrete rings, and open perimeter lock-in bays where all five of our wheelchairs parked in a tight circle beneath the dome while the sensory-safe sound system played a gentle, low-decibel cosmic soundtrack with zero sudden thunderclaps or startling strobe flashes.

And after sunset, when the Bortle Class 2 dark skies of Highland County blazed to life above the Allegheny ridges with the naked-eye ribbon of the Milky Way, we rolled out into the Roll-Off Roof Observatory.

As the timber-and-steel roof glided silently open on its cushioned rails, Valerie guided us to the twenty-four-inch Ritchey-Chrétien research telescope at the center of the polished concrete deck. Fitted to the rear cell of the telescope was a custom counterweight-balanced, articulated periscope relay eyepiece engineered specifically to swing down to the exact seated eye level of any manual, power, or tilt-in-space wheelchair.

One by one—first Lyra, then Orion, then Celeste, then Katie, and then me—we rolled up to the articulated eyepiece without having to transfer or lift an inch out of our seats, peering into the crystal-clear optics at the golden, tilted rings of Saturn—the namesake of the Cassini spacecraft—floating jewel-bright against the black velvet of deep space.

When Katie sat back from the eyepiece and reached her left hand across to hold mine while resting her right hand gently beside Lyra’s armrest, her eyes were shining under the starlight.

“We’ve visited every corner of all ninety-five counties and thirty-eight independent cities in Virginia this year, Valerie,” Katie whispered softly so she wouldn’t disturb the quiet mountain sanctuary around Lyra, Orion, and Celeste. “Before we rolled down our minivan ramp at four-thirty this afternoon, I had never seen the Cassini Center in person—and after seeing what you and your cousins have built here for the children and families of Virginia, this place right here on Cowpasture Road in Palo Alto has officially become my favorite place in the entire Commonwealth. Everywhere else in the world, Nate and I have to fight to bolt a ramp onto a building that was designed to keep us out. Here, you built the entire universe at the exact height of our chairs."

Thursday, October 22, 2026, 8:00 PM to 10:15 PM — The Empty-Podium WHRC TV-15 Debate on Hampton Boulevard & The 8:24 PM Three-Bus Sprint Home

"Come on, Nate, Dad—we have twenty-four minutes to make the curb on Hampton Boulevard!" Katie called out at 8:00:00 PM on Thursday evening, October 22, 2026, pivoting her SwiftChair down the studio stage ramp the exact second the red camera tally light winked off inside the WHRC TV-15 and WHRC 89.5 FM public broadcast studios adjacent to Virginia Dominion University in Norfolk.

Forty-eight hours earlier, trailing by seven points in every independent poll across Virginia, Republican nominee Richard Sterling had panicked and boycotted the marquee televised debate after WHRC TV-15 refused to ban moderator Catherine Lindsey from asking about his support for a national abortion ban, his plan to gut Medicaid disability waivers, or President Garrett Thorne's attacks on "Broken Katie Prairie." So for sixty straight minutes from seven to eight o'clock live across every public television and radio station in the Commonwealth, forty-one-year-old Katie had sat in her SwiftChair beside Sterling's empty mahogany podium and answered every voter question with surgical mastery—laying out the exact statutory math for universal healthcare, reproductive freedom, transgender civil rights, common-sense gun safety, the three Virginia Constitutional Amendments on the November ballot, the local one-percent public school construction sales tax referendum, and the East-West Commonwealth Rail Corridor.

Now, declining the studio green-room sparkling water and pundit small talk, the three of us had to thread a razor-thin, three-bus evening transfer chain before the suburban routes shut down for the night.

Rolling out the front doors of the WHRC studio to the Hampton Boulevard bus stop alongside Dad, we caught the 8:24 PM southbound CVTA Route 2 bus down Hampton Boulevard and across Norfolk into the Military Highway Station transfer hub. Rolling off Route 2 at 8:58 PM, we crossed the platform to board the 9:10 PM eastbound CVTA Route 20 along Virginia Beach Boulevard—watching the minutes tick down on my phone as the bus hit every red light near Newtown Road—until our driver pulled up to the intersection of Military Highway and Virginia Beach Boulevard at 9:41 PM, just four minutes before the 9:45 PM final outbound CVTA Route 15 of the night pulled up to the curb heading south toward Indian River Road and Kempsville!

As the Route 15 operator locked our four-point floor straps into place and the bus rolled south down Military Highway in the dark, a nursing student sitting across the aisle looked up from watching the replay of the WHRC debate on her phone, stared at Katie and me in our wheelchairs right in front of her, and gasped out loud.

“Wait—you’re Senator Katie Prairie! You were just on television across the entire state of Virginia an hour and forty-five minutes ago!” the student exclaimed. “And you’re really riding the last 9:45 PM Route 15 bus home to Kempsville?!”

“If I don’t make the 9:45 PM transfer at Military Highway and Virginia Beach Boulevard, I don’t get home tonight either,” Katie smiled warmly across the aisle, squeezing my hand as the bus rolled toward home. “And starting in January, we’re taking this exact fight to the floor of the United States Senate.”

The Senator from Virginia

Election Night, The Decision Desk Call, & The Referendum Mandate

Part 1: Polls Close at Seven, The 8:42 PM Decision Desk Call, & Victory in Virginia Beach

Date: 2026-11-03 at 19:00 America/New_York

Tuesday, November 3, 2026, 7:00 PM — Polls Close & The PHP Precinct Dashboard in Virginia Beach

“Seven o’clock on the dot—polls are officially closed across the Commonwealth of Virginia,” our sixty-eight-year-old dad said, setting three tall paper cups of ice-cold ginger ale down on the folding table beside my MagnaBook Pro inside the quiet green room behind the Virginia Beach convention ballroom. “How fast is the State Board of Elections JSON endpoint pushing the early-vote abstracts tonight, Nate?”

“Refreshing every fifteen seconds, Dad,” I replied, tapping a keyboard shortcut to refresh the custom PHP precinct-aggregation dashboard I had coded on my laptop while Katie rolled her compact silver-and-black SwiftChair power wheelchair flush against my left armrest and laced her fingers through mine.

Through the closed double doors at the end of the carpeted hallway, we could already hear six hundred supporters packing the ballroom floor—Coastal Virginia Transit Authority bus drivers still wearing their navy uniform jackets after finishing their afternoon shifts, community college students from CCHR, shipyard mechanics from Newport News, and nearly two dozen fellow wheelchair users who had ridden the evening bus pulse in from across Hampton Roads because they knew our campaign had picked a venue right on a regular bus line with a permanent, wide stage ramp.

Looking at the clean, color-coded precinct tables rendering on my laptop screen, Katie let out a quiet breath and rested her temple against my shoulder for two seconds.

Twenty-nine years had passed since the autumn of 1997, when Katie and I were twelve-year-old seventh graders at Morrison Middle School learning how to write raw HTML tags by hand in a plain text editor. Back then, watching his two autistic twelve-year-old twins stay up past supper building multi-page HTML websites from scratch had lit a fire under our dad—inspiring him to enroll at the Community College of Hampton Roads so he could earn his computer science degree and build a better life for the three of us. Four years later, during the summer and autumn of 2001—the year of our ill-fated Caribbean cruise on the Sunward Tropics and the September Friday when the borrowed time in our legs finally ran out—Katie and I had sat side by side reading Dad's mylar-wrapped Quantum Basic 5.0 library textbooks cover to cover so we could learn Quantum Basic 6.0 right alongside him before earning our Advanced Studies Diplomas from Virginia Beach City Public Schools at Northwood High School and our Associate of Applied Science degrees from the Community College of Hampton Roads. And in March 2007, after twelve unforgettable days at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville—where we rushed a two-week Vocational Evaluation in a single week after an evaluator actually suggested training us as ValueMart door greeters, got written up as Level 2 clients for locking ourselves inside a seasonal closet, and dropped out with our friend Tina after watching the administration sweep a classmate's assault under the rug—we had worked on the copied PHP and SQL modules unofficially from home for just a few days before deciding to do our own thing at our house off Military Highway in Kempsville, filming our twenty-three-year-old Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit four-bus mayoral loop in 2008, and building websites and desktop applications for the next nineteen years, buying our second Kempsville home on Lord Nelson Drive strictly fifty-fifty in October 2019 the moment CVTA launched the new Route 24 down Kempsville Road.

Every single line of code running our statewide U.S. Senate campaign's turnout model tonight had been written by the two of us at our own desks—without a single K Street data consultant or Washington party contractor touching our servers.

"First batch of Hampton Roads and Richmond early-vote precincts just dropped," I said at 7:18 PM as the green table rows populated down my screen. "Katie, look at Virginia Beach, Norfolk, and Chesapeake. You're outrunning the 2024 baseline by nine points in Kempsville and eleven points along the Military Highway Route 15 corridor."

"What about the Peninsula and the Shenandoah Valley?" Katie asked, leaning closer as her blue eyes tracked the numbers line by line.

"Newport News around Peninsula Commons Mall just came in at seventy-one percent for you, Williamsburg is running fourteen points ahead of projections, and Augusta County right around Fishersville and Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center is giving us the highest Democratic margin in twenty years," I said, my voice catching as the next wave of JSON packets streamed in from the New River Valley and the Alleghenies. "Look at Highland County up in Palo Alto—Valerie and the Cassini Center precinct just came in nineteen points above the 2024 baseline. And look at Montgomery County and Radford—the student, faculty, and Brooks family precincts around Commonwealth Polytechnic Institute and Radford University just reported. You're carrying Blacksburg and Christiansburg by thirty-eight points."

Dad adjusted his glasses, leaning over our shoulders as he turned up the volume on the center wall-mounted television monitor tuned to Global News Network, where GNN's signature Election Night data correspondent Stephen Kovacs—wearing his trademark rolled-up white shirtsleeves, khaki trousers, and striped tie—was pacing excitedly in front of the glowing interactive GNN Big Board.

“Hold on, look at what’s happening down in Southwest Virginia along the Interstate 81 and Interstate 77 spine!” Stephen Kovacs said on the broadcast, tapping his fingers rapidly against the touchscreen of the GNN Big Board to zoom into the Ninth Congressional District. “At first glance on our county map, Carroll County down on the Blue Ridge plateau is shaded red. Wait a second—let’s tap the municipal precinct overlay inside Carroll County and pull up the Town of Bluewater! Remember, folks, Bluewater is the largest incorporated town in the entire Commonwealth of Virginia because the voters in Bluewater have always refused to break away from Carroll County and become an independent city. If Bluewater were an independent city like Galax or Radford right up the highway, look at what you’d see on the Big Board right now: a bright blue circle right in the middle of Carroll County! State Senator Katie Prairie is winning the Town of Bluewater sixty-four percent to thirty-six percent—where she rode the Bluewater Transit Maroon Express bus right into town across from Bluewater High School—and she is cutting Richard Sterling’s rural margins by twelve to eighteen points from Bluewater and Abingdon all the way out to Big Stone Gap!”

On the television screen, Kovacs swiped his hand east across the Blue Ridge escarpment along U.S. Route 58 into Southside Virginia, pulling up Martinsville, Henry County, Danville, and Pittsylvania County in the Fifth Congressional District.

“And slide right across Route 58 with me from Bluewater into Southside Virginia!” Kovacs exclaimed, circling Danville and Pittsylvania County in bright yellow on the touchscreen. “In any normal Virginia statewide race, a Republican nominee has to run up fifty-point margins in rural Pittsylvania and Henry Counties just to stay alive against Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads. Look at the numbers coming out of Southside tonight: Katie Prairie is carrying the Independent Cities of Danville and Martinsville by twenty-two points, and she is shaving nearly eleven points off Richard Sterling’s Republican baseline across rural Pittsylvania and Henry Counties! Senator Prairie’s own twenty-four-year-old legislative assistants Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins coined the name for this back in May—they call it ‘the Uncle Richard Effect,’ after their maternal uncle, longtime Southside delegate and retired Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway, a household name across Virginia politics who crossed party lines at a Danville bus shelter on live television to endorse Katie Prairie because she protected his three autistic kids when they were eighth-grade House Pages, hired all three of them onto her Senate staff, and championed the Piedmont Regional Transit bus link connecting Martinsville and Danville! When the former Republican House Majority Leader looks Southside voters in the eye and tells them Katie Prairie had his family’s back for ten years, there is no Super PAC attack ad in Washington that can overcome that math!”

“Remember back in May when Senator Martin Warren’s chief of staff Gregory told the newspapers that two software developers in wheelchairs riding public buses could never beat the party establishment’s handpicked nominee Preston Holloway in the June primary?” Dad asked with a quiet, wry smile.

“They thought politics belonged to the people who wrote the biggest checks at Washington cocktail parties,” Katie said softly, squeezing my hand across our wheelchair armrests. “They forgot that the people riding the bus vote too.”

Tuesday, November 3, 2026, 8:42 PM — The Decision Desk Call & Three Constitutional Amendments Pass

At twenty minutes past eight, the raw precinct feeds from Northern Virginia—Alexandria, Arlington, Fairfax, and Prince William County—flooded into our PHP database all at once.

I watched the statewide mathematical regression curve on my terminal window cross the ninety-nine-point-nine percent confidence threshold before any television anchor on the wall monitors even opened their mouth.

“Nate?” Katie whispered, seeing my fingers freeze over my mechanical keyboard.

I turned my head and looked straight into my forty-one-year-old twin sister’s blue eyes.

“He can’t catch you, Katie,” I said softly, my throat tightening. “Even if he won seventy percent of every remaining uncounted precinct west of Interstate 81, our leads in Hampton Roads, Richmond, the CPI corridor, and Alexandria are mathematically insurmountable. You just won the United States Senate seat.”

Ten seconds later, at 8:42 PM Eastern Standard Time, a sharp orchestral chime rang out simultaneously from all four television monitors on the green room wall.

On the center screen, the red-and-blue map of Virginia flashed bright gold as the banner across the bottom of the broadcast changed in bold white letters:

GNN DECISION DESK — PROJECTED WINNER: STATE SEN. KATIE PRAIRIE (D-VIRGINIA) ELECTED TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

Right beside it, the GBS Evening Report, Beacon News, and the Associated Wire flashed the exact same call within five seconds of one another.

Outside in the main ballroom, a roar went up so loud it rattled the framed pictures on the green room drywall—six hundred voices cheering, stomping, and chanting Katie’s name while air horns and applause echoed down the corridor.

Inside our quiet room, Katie didn’t look at the television screens first. She turned her wheelchair slightly toward me, threw both arms around my neck across our armrests, and buried her face against my shoulder while Dad wrapped both of his arms around the two of us from behind.

“We did it, Nate,” Katie whispered against my collar, her voice thick with tears. “From the Route 15 bus stop on Military Highway all the way to the United States Senate.”

“Every single mile together, Senator,” I whispered back, holding my twin sister tight while Dad kissed the top of her blonde hair and wiped his eyes behind his glasses.

When Katie sat back and wiped her cheeks with the back of her hand, she looked back at my MagnaBook Pro screen, where the three statewide ballot referendums and the local city question were finishing their final tallies.

“Tell me about the three Constitutional Amendments, Nate,” Katie said immediately. “Did all three pass?”

“Every single one of them just crossed the projection threshold with statewide YES majorities,” I told her, pointing to the three green confirmation banners at the bottom of our PHP dashboard. “Question 1—the Right to Reproductive Freedom Amendment—just passed by twelve points. Question 2—the Marriage Equality Amendment repealing the old 2006 ban and locking affirmative marriage rights into the Constitution of Virginia—passed by fifteen points. And Question 3—automatic Restoration of Voting Rights upon completion of a prison term—just passed by nine points. Everything you co-patroned and voted for across the 2025 and 2026 General Assembly sessions in Richmond is officially part of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia.”

Katie closed her eyes for a heartbeat, nodding with deep, quiet satisfaction. “Then every single oath I ever swore on the Constitution of Virginia was worth it.”

“Wait—what’s that red banner on the local municipal tab at the bottom?” Dad asked, pointing toward the lower right corner of my screen.

I scrolled down two inches to the local municipal referendum tally—the one-percent local retail sales tax dedicated strictly to public school construction and major facility modernization, which the General Assembly had authorized cities and counties to put before their voters tonight. Remembering the aging classrooms and accessibility hurdles at Northwood High School when our legs gave out in September 2001, Katie and I had both campaigned hard for a YES vote and marked YES on our own ballots in Kempsville.

“The local one-percent school construction sales tax referendum failed,” I said quietly, reading the certified precinct totals across the city. “The NO vote carried fifty-four to forty-six. Between grocery inflation and utility bills, working families just didn’t have the stomach for another one-percent sales tax at the cash register.”

Katie stared at the red NO tally for a long moment, her jaw setting with that familiar, unshakeable resolve I had known since we were children.

“I respect the voters’ decision—working families are stretched thin right now, and nobody likes paying higher sales tax,” Katie said evenly. “But the roofs on our public schools still leak, and disabled kids in wheelchairs still get stuck behind broken school elevators. If local taxpayers can’t shoulder that burden through a sales tax, then my job in the United States Senate starting in January is to bring federal school infrastructure and IDEA modernization grants straight home to Virginia.”

Tuesday, November 3, 2026, 9:15 PM — The Ramp to the Podium & A Toast With Three Glasses of Ginger Ale

At five minutes past nine, Katie’s smartphone vibrated on the table beside her cup of ginger ale.

It was Republican nominee Richard Sterling calling from his hotel suite in Henrico County to concede the race. The call lasted less than ninety seconds—stiff, formal, and clipped—and when Katie thanked him politely and tapped the red end-call button, the ballroom coordinator knocked on our door with a wide grin.

“Senator-Elect Prairie?” the coordinator beamed. “The crowd out there hasn’t stopped chanting for thirty minutes. Are you three ready?”

“All three of us,” Katie said, checking that the small gold Seal of Virginia pin was straight on her royal-blue blazer lapel before reaching her left hand across to take mine.

As the double doors swung open, the driving synthesizer pulse and soaring eighties rock chorus of our official campaign theme song—“The Accessibility Project” by The Paper Wall—blasted across the convention ballroom sound system: We’re building a map, we’re sharing the key! Drawing the grid, unlocking the door, we’re leveling the playing field, settling the score! Beneath the sweeping spotlight beams at the base of the wide, gently sloped aluminum stage ramp, Katie and I nudged our right thumbs forward on our SwiftChair joysticks and rolled side by side up onto the ballroom stage with Dad walking proudly on his own two feet right beside Katie’s chair.

Above our heads, a shower of blue and gold paper confetti drifted down under the stage lights while the giant projection screen behind us blazed with the GNN Decision Desk banner proclaiming Katie Prairie the newest United States Senator from Virginia.

Looking out across the cheering sea of faces—seeing the CVTA bus operators waving their caps in the front row, the CCHR students holding handmade signs, and the kids in power wheelchairs lined up along the accessible front aisle looking up at a United States Senator whose chair looked just like theirs—Katie squeezed my hand tightly in front of the cameras before rolling two feet forward to the lowered podium microphone.

“Eighteen years ago, my twin brother Nate and I sat at the bus loop at the Community College of Hampton Roads waiting to see if a single candidate for local office would ride four buses across Virginia Beach with us,” Katie’s voice rang out clear and steady across the ballroom speakers. “We learned that day that if working people, transit riders, and disabled Virginians couldn’t even catch a bus home from a six o’clock City Council meeting before the last Route 12 left CCHR at 5:48 PM, nobody was going to hand us a seat at the table—we were going to have to roll up the ramp and build that table ourselves! Tonight, you proved that the Commonwealth of Virginia doesn’t belong to billionaire donors or Washington party gatekeepers. You enshrined reproductive freedom, marriage equality, and voting rights directly into the Constitution of Virginia, and on January third, Nate, Dad, and I are taking the morning train up from Norfolk to bring your voices straight to the floor of the United States Senate!”

An hour later, after shaking every hand along the front Rope Line without a single drop of champagne anywhere near our stage, the three of us sat together in the quiet green room while the crew coiled the microphone cables outside.

Raising our three paper cups of ice-cold ginger ale—the exact same toast we had kept since New Year’s Eve when we were seventeen years old, and the only drink compatible with the daily maintenance medication that kept all three of us alive—Dad, Katie, and I tapped our rims together in the center of the room.

“To the Senator from Virginia,” Dad said softly.

“To the three of us,” Katie replied, smiling across at Dad and me. “Now let’s go home to Kempsville and get some sleep—because tomorrow morning the real work starts.”

Part 2: The Morning After in Kempsville, The School Tax Referendum, & Jess's Open Letter on The Grid

Date: 2026-11-04 at 08:30 America/New_York

Wednesday, November 4, 2026, 8:30 AM — Kempsville Morning, Morning Medications, & The Failed School Construction Referendum

"Pills first before anybody touches a keyboard or answers a press call," Dad said cheerfully at eight-thirty on Wednesday morning, setting the fresh glass carafe of dark-roast coffee down beside the three amber prescription bottles lined up on the roll-under oak breakfast table of our Kempsville kitchen.

Sunlight streamed through the white-trimmed kitchen window onto the hardwood floor of the Virginia Beach house that Katie and I owned fifty-fifty—the house we had bought with the income from our PHP websites and desktop software, where both of our names sat side by side on the City of Virginia Beach deed, and where we were registered to vote. On the warm cream wall right behind our breakfast table hung the framed watercolor print of a blue butterfly that had watched over our sibling sanctuary since childhood.

Wearing a soft lavender fleece zip pullover instead of her Senatorial suit jacket, forty-one-year-old United States Senator-Elect Katie Prairie unscrewed her amber pill bottle, tapped her morning maintenance tablet into her palm, and washed it down with half a glass of ice-cold ginger ale right as Dad and I took ours.

Across the bottom of every one of our three prescription bottles sat the bright red pharmacy auxiliary warning label reminding us that mixing the medication with alcohol or tobacco carried a known side effect of death. Even if Katie and I hadn't already sworn off alcohol for life behind a locked bedroom door during our cousin Brittany's drunken New Year's Eve party back on December 31, 2002, those three amber bottles meant that on the morning after winning a United States Senate seat, our kitchen smelled like toasted bagels, hot black coffee, and cold ginger ale—with zero hangovers in sight.

As Dad stood beside the table pouring fresh black coffee into his ceramic mug while Katie and I had our cold glasses of ginger ale in front of us—since neither of us had ever liked the taste of coffee—Katie reached her right hand across the table corner to hold my left hand while we looked together at the screen of our open MagnaBook Pro laptop.

"I just pushed your official morning-after statement on the local one-percent school construction sales tax referendum to our press feed," I told her, glancing over the clean HTML markup before hitting publish.

On the screen sat the exact words Katie had dictated five minutes after rolling out of our bedroom:

I respect the voters' decision at the ballot box—working families are stretched thin, and nobody likes paying higher sales tax. But the roofs on our public schools still leak, and disabled students still face broken elevators. If local taxpayers can't shoulder that burden through a sales tax, then my job in the United States Senate is to bring federal infrastructure dollars home to Virginia so our kids have safe, modern, accessible schools without squeezing local families.

"The Republican campaign committee already put out a press release at eight o'clock claiming voters repudiated 'tax-and-spend Katie Prairie' because you voted YES on the school referendum," Dad noted, taking a sip from his coffee mug.

"Let them spin all they want, Dad," Katie replied calmly. "We just won the United States Senate race by nine points and passed all three Virginia Constitutional Amendments on the exact same ballot. Telling the truth about why I voted YES—and promising to fight for federal school modernization grants so local homeowners and grocery shoppers don't get squeezed—is why voters trust us in the first place."

"Speaking of people losing their minds over a nine-point landslide," I said, tapping a key to unmute the small wall-mounted television screen in the corner of the kitchen where Beacon News was replaying a live six-thirty morning call-in from the Oval Office, "have you two seen what President Garrett Thorne has been posting and screaming since midnight?"

Even though Republican nominee Richard Sterling had called Katie at five minutes past nine the night before to formally concede the race after losing by more than three hundred and sixty thousand votes across the Commonwealth, President Garrett Thorne was having a full-blown, unhinged meltdown in Washington. Across the bottom of the Beacon News broadcast crawled a bright red quote graphic as Thorne's gravelly voice blared through the studio speakerphone:

There is NO WAY "Broken Katie Prairie"—a total nobody in a wheelchair who doesn't even have a campaign bus and rides around on city buses with her brother—could possibly beat our great candidate in Virginia! Where did those 8:20 PM votes in Alexandria, Bluewater, and Danville come from?! Rigged machines and her brother's computer servers in Virginia Beach STOLE THE VOTE! Looking at a MASSIVE INVESTIGATION!

Sitting at our oak breakfast table with her glass of ginger ale in her hand, Katie stared at the television screen for three seconds—and then burst out laughing.

"A total nobody who came out of nowhere?" Katie laughed, shaking her head in disbelief. "Does the President of the United States not have a single staffer in the West Wing who knows how to use a search engine? I have been on the ballot in the Commonwealth of Virginia for sixteen years! I served three years on the Virginia Beach City Council, four years in the Virginia House of Delegates, and seven years in the Senate of Virginia! Last night was my seventh consecutive election victory since 2010! Just because Garrett Thorne thinks anyone in a wheelchair is invisible—and can't fathom how a woman who rides the bus could beat his candidate by three hundred and sixty thousand votes—he's pretending I materialized out of thin air to steal an election that his own candidate conceded twelve hours ago!"

"And look at what he just claimed about my laptop," I added, grinning as I pulled up the Virginia Department of Elections technical specification page on my MagnaBook Pro. "He thinks our Kempsville PHP dashboard 'hacked the voting machines' at 8:20 PM—apparently unaware that under Code of Virginia Section 24.2-626, one hundred percent of votes in every precinct in the Commonwealth of Virginia are cast on paper optical-scan ballots that are completely air-gapped from the internet, and that all my script did was read the public JSON tally sheets after bipartisan precinct captains phoned them in!”

Before Katie could even dictate a press response, the split-screen on Beacon News cut live to the Danville bus shelter on U.S. Route 58—where retired Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway, standing in his coat and tie beside Aunt Marge Callaway while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins held their morning transit folders behind him, looked straight into the camera lens on conservative television.

“Mr. President, I served twenty-four years as a Republican in the Virginia House of Delegates and as Republican House Majority Leader, and I am telling you right now to stop embarrassing yourself and our party,” Uncle Richard said bluntly on live national television, making the Beacon News anchor blink in sheer panic. “Nobody stole a single vote in Southside Virginia or anywhere else in this Commonwealth. Every ballot in Pittsylvania County, Henry County, Danville, and Martinsville is a paper optical-scan ballot counted by bipartisan Republican and Democratic election officers whom Marge and I have known for thirty years. And Katie Prairie didn’t come out of nowhere—she served three years on the Virginia Beach City Council, four years across the aisle from me in the House of Delegates, and seven years in the Senate of Virginia! She won by three hundred and sixty thousand votes because she rode regular public buses into all ninety-five counties, hired my three autistic kids onto her Senate staff when they graduated high school, and kept every promise she ever made to working families.”

Wednesday, November 4, 2026, 9:45 AM — Jess’s Open Letter on The Grid & The Ironclad Prenup Mandate

At quarter to ten, while I was checking the morning analytics on our shared network of websites and monitoring the post-election commentary across The Grid, a text post shared by thousands of grassroots Virginia and national voters caught my eye at the top of our feed.

“Katie,” I said, sliding the MagnaBook Pro two inches closer to the center of the table so she could read the screen clearly. “Look at this open letter to the national party that’s going viral on The Grid this morning. Somebody named Jess posted it an hour ago, and forty thousand people have already shared it.”

Katie leaned forward in her SwiftChair, her eyes moving down the paragraphs on the screen. After the third sentence, she began reading the post aloud across our kitchen table in a quiet, electric voice:

“She says: Recognize that we did this largely despite the Establishment Dems, not because of them… Take the words ‘compromise’ and ‘working with our friends across the aisle’ out of your vocabulary. If the last ten years have taught us anything, it’s that we have no friends across the aisle. This is what an actual referendum looks like. Use it. Don’t just glue what they broke back together. Re-envision it. Re-engineer it. Don’t try to take us back to where we were; take us where we always promised we could be.”

Dad stopped by the counter with the coffee carafe in his hand, listening intently as Katie kept reading down the screen:

"Codify all of it. Act like you're headed into your second marriage after a messy divorce and you're writing a pre-nup. Make it iron-clad. Irrefutable. Include every last detail down to who gets the coffee filters. I mean All of it. Release the trafficker files. If you or your friends or colleagues or benefactors are in them, too bad. You abuse children, you're done. That's how this works now. Prove that 'no' means 'no' again. That includes the 'no' in the sentence 'No one is above the law.'"

Katie's fingertips tightened around the edge of the oak table as she read the final paragraphs aloud:

"Remember that DEI stands for Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion and then DEI the crap out of the Capitol. No apologies, no excuses. The people leading this country should look like the country they serve, not the billionaires who own them. Trust that they will continue to play dirty. That when, come January, the repercussions of their so-called 'big beautiful bill' begin to rain down on the folks who were bamboozled into thinking that it would somehow make their lives better, they will blame you. Without logic, without rhyme nor reason, they will say it's your fault that their bill is hurting people. They will lie. Because that is what they do. Get ahead of it. Be proactive. Educate. Call out the lies. Bring receipts. Take questions, hold press conferences and town halls… And then get to work. Do EVERYTHING that we sent you there to do. All of it. Shy away from nothing. Blinders on, elbows out, unshakable principles leading the way."

For ten full seconds after Katie finished reading, the kitchen was completely quiet except for the morning birds outside in our Kempsville oak trees.

"I have no idea who Jess is," Katie said slowly, looking from the laptop screen up at Dad and me with a fire in her blue eyes that reminded me of the afternoon in January 2016 when she took the microphone in the House General Laws Subcommittee in Richmond and obliterated the bathroom bill in three minutes flat. "But she just wrote my entire six-year Senate playbook."

"Every single word of it," I agreed, opening a fresh Markdown document in Quantum Code right beside our browser window to save the text. "Look at what she said about not just gluing what they broke back together, but re-engineering it and codifying it like a prenup before a second marriage after a messy divorce—down to who gets the coffee filters. That is literally how we write software, Katie. Unwritten Washington 'norms' and gentlemen's agreements are just unpatched security vulnerabilities waiting for a bad actor to exploit."

"And as Virginia's new United States Senator, I am going to patch every single one of them into black-letter federal statute," Katie said firmly. "Because federal anti-nepotism law under Title 5, Section 3110 of the United States Code bars a Member of Congress from putting a sibling on a paid government payroll—and because neither of us would ever want you answering to a government bureaucracy anyway—you're staying a private citizen, earning our living through our fifty-fifty software business, and sitting right beside me in Dirksen as my unpaid chief data strategist while I hold the Senate seat and cast the votes on the floor. The national party establishment tried to block my candidacy in the June primary because they wanted a polite corporate insider who wouldn't rock the boat. I won this Senate seat despite them, not because of them. When we take the train up to Washington on January third, I am not going up there to water down my bills to appease bullies who voted to strip healthcare and disability rights from people on the bus."

She tapped her finger on the table beside her glass of ginger ale, counting off her Senatorial mandate right across our kitchen table.

“I will sponsor bills to codify reproductive freedom—because abortion and reproductive healthcare is a private medical decision between a woman and her doctor, and no politician or judge belongs in that exam room—alongside universal healthcare for every person in America, full federal civil rights protections for transgender Americans, marriage equality, voting rights, common-sense gun safety legislation, wheelchair right-to-repair, and repealing the SSI and Medicaid disability marriage penalty down to the last statutory comma—down to who gets the coffee filters,” Katie declared. “The National Firearms Association up in Fairfax has given me an F grade on every scorecard since 2013 because I fight for universal background checks, red-flag laws, safe storage, and banning weapons of war, and I wear that F grade as a badge of honor right alongside the televangelists’ outrage when I affirm my oath on the Constitution of the United States. I will use my vote in the Senate to demand the full, unredacted release of the federal child-trafficking files, and I don’t care whose billionaire donors or political friends are named in them—you abuse children, you’re done, and no one is above the law. I will put Diversity, Equity, Inclusion, and Accessibility at the front door of my Senate office so Capitol Hill looks like the working people, transit riders, wheelchair users, and neurodivergent thinkers I was elected to serve. And before the delayed January fallout of the opposition’s prior ‘big beautiful bill’ hits working families and they try to lie and blame us for their own law, you and I are going to build a live public receipts dashboard in PHP and ride local public transit to town halls across every corner of Virginia to show voters the exact roll-call votes and effective dates.”

Dad smiled proudly, setting his coffee mug down on the counter. “Blinders on, elbows out?”

“Blinders on, elbows out, Dad,” Katie grinned, squeezing my hand across our armrests. “Now let’s look at the sixty-day transition calendar between today and January third—because we’ve got an orientation in Washington next week, a State Board of Elections certification on December seventh, a official Senate website vendor to audit, and a State Senate seat in Richmond I have to formally resign before we can board that five o’clock morning train to Alexandria.”

Part 3: U.S. Senate New Member Orientation, Senator Tess Dunmore’s Ramp, & Making the Vice President Swear Her In

Date: 2026-11-16 at 08:45 America/New_York

Monday, November 16, 2026, 8:45 AM — Rolling Past the Chartered VIP Motorcoach & Retiring Senator Martin Warren’s Stare

“Hold the charter bus door—is Senator-Elect Prairie on this shuttle from the hotel?” a Senate Sergeant at Arms protocol officer called into his lapel radio outside the bronze doors of the Russell Senate Office Building on Monday morning as two black-and-silver Capitol Police escort vans idled at the curb along Constitution Avenue.

“Right behind you on the sidewalk, actually,” Katie called out cheerfully as she and I steered our two compact black SwiftChair power wheelchairs down the concrete curb cut from First Street Southeast—right past the brown Capitol South station pylon striped with the Blue, Orange, and Silver lines—with our sixty-eight-year-old dad walking beside us carrying his leather briefcase.

The protocol officer spun around on the granite steps, blinking in disbelief as he looked from the chartered luxury motorcoach—where the other eleven members of the incoming freshman Senate class were stepping down the stairs in tailored overcoats—to the two forty-one-year-old twins who had just rolled up the public sidewalk from the Capitol South station elevator with CapitalPass transit cards tucked into their jacket pockets.

“You… you took the subway to New Member Orientation, Senator-Elect?” the officer stammered.

“The five o’clock morning ARTS train up from Norfolk, the mobile lift off the train at Alexandria so we could drop our suitcases at our dad’s house on Sunset Drive, the Capital Transit Yellow Line across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge to L’Enfant Plaza, and the Blue Line two stops to Capitol South,” Katie smiled, holding up her blue plastic fare card before reaching across our armrests to squeeze my hand. “Why sit in downtown traffic on a charter bus when the train drops you off a block from the front door?”

Ten minutes later, when the three of us rolled through the tall double doors of the historic Kennedy Caucus Room on the third floor of the Russell Building—under the crystal chandeliers and towering Corinthian columns where the Senate Democratic Caucus was gathering for its post-election orientation breakfast—the hum of conversation near the coffee urns went noticeably quiet.

Standing near the center aisle with a saucer in his hand was retiring three-term United States Senator Martin Warren of Virginia, flanked by his departing chief of staff, Gregory, and two senior consultants from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Katie hadn’t flipped a Republican seat in November; both of Virginia’s United States Senate seats were already held by Democrats—Senior Senator Thomas Keane and retiring Senator Martin Warren. Back in the winter, when Senator Warren had announced he was retiring after eighteen years in Washington, he and the big-money K Street establishment had tried to stage a coronation. They had handpicked Preston Holloway—a polished McLean venture capitalist businessman with a contact list full of billionaire donors—to take over Warren’s seat, pouring fourteen million dollars of Super PAC money into the June 16 Democratic primary while Gregory told the Washington newspapers that two autistic software developers in wheelchairs riding public transit buses were a “cute regional novelty” and a hopeless long shot who wouldn’t break twenty percent statewide.

Instead, the voters of Virginia had blown their coronation to smithereens. Riding regular public buses across all ninety-five counties and thirty-eight independent cities without taking a dime of corporate PAC money, Katie had crushed Senator Warren’s handpicked corporate stooge by eleven points in the June primary and then defeated Republican nominee Richard Sterling by nine points in the November general election—while across the rest of the map, Democrats had flipped seven Republican seats to capture a fifty-four-to-forty-six Senate majority for the incoming One Hundred Twentieth Congress.

And when the National Firearms Association—the massive gun lobby headquartered right up the road in Fairfax—had plastered television airwaves and mailboxes across the Commonwealth with glossy red-and-black attack mailers branding her "F-Rated Radical Katie Prairie" because she unapologetically called the MR-15 semiautomatic rifle a weapon of war and championed common-sense gun safety legislation, Katie had laughed out loud at our kitchen table, asked me to put their postcard in a black wooden frame on our transition office wall, and worn that F grade from the National Firearms Association on every debate stage like a badge of honor. She had never once hedged or hidden who she was: she ran unabashedly for universal healthcare so no family would ever face bankruptcy over a spinal cord injury or a chronic illness, she stood up fiercely for transgender rights and bodily autonomy against Restore the Republic smear campaigns claiming she wanted "men in women's sports and men in women's restrooms," and whenever anyone asked her about reproductive freedom, she looked straight into the camera and said in plain, unmistakable words that abortion was a private medical decision between a woman and her doctor—and that no politician, judge, or bureaucrat in Washington belonged in that exam room.

Before Senator Warren or his red-faced chief of staff could decide whether to look at the ceiling or walk over, our other Senator from Virginia, Thomas Keane, broke away from the front table with a wide, genuine grin and walked straight down the carpet to meet our wheelchairs.

"Make way for my new partner from the Commonwealth of Virginia!" Senator Keane beamed, shaking Katie's hand warmly before shaking mine and Dad's. "Katie, Nate, David—welcome to the United States Senate. Did you see the final certified turnout numbers out of Hampton Roads, the Shenandoah Valley, and Montgomery County? You two put together the biggest grassroots margin in Virginia in twelve years."

A half-beat later, retiring Senator Martin Warren stepped over, clearing his throat as he offered Katie a stiff, polite handshake while Gregory stared fixedly at the carpet behind him.

"Congratulations on a well-run campaign, Katie," Senator Warren said, trying to sound magnanimous. "My staff and I have prepared a transition binder of our donor and stakeholder contacts so your office can maintain continuity—"

"Thank you, Senator Warren, that won't be necessary," Katie said politely, her blue eyes calm and crystal clear as she looked up from her SwiftChair. "The transit riders, shipyard welders, teachers, and disabled Virginians who nominated me in June and elected me in November already gave my brother and me all the stakeholder contacts we need. Enjoy your retirement."

Beside me, Dad had to disguise a grin behind a cough as Gregory's ears turned crimson and Senator Warren nodded stiffly before retreating toward the buffet table.

Moments later, as Senate Democratic Leader Charles Schuman of New York called the new Democratic Senators-Elect together at the center of the ornate Oriental rug for the official freshman class photograph, another wheelchair rolled smoothly out of the circle of tailored suits to meet us.

Sitting in an ultralight black ApexLite manual wheelchair—dressed in a navy suit, white shirt, red tie, and brown dress shoes, with a neatly trimmed beard and the powerful shoulders of an athlete—was forty-seven-year-old Senator-Elect Joshua "Josh" Novak of Iowa. Born with spina bifida, Josh was a two-time Paralympic gold medalist in wheelchair basketball and a former Iowa State Representative from Council Bluffs who had just stunned the national pundits on Tuesday night by flipping Iowa's open Republican Senate seat after scaling thousands of steep front-porch steps on his hands and backside to knock on doors across all ninety-nine Iowa counties.

"Senator-Elect Prairie—and you must be Nate and David," Josh beamed, braking his manual chair beside our two motorized SwiftChairs and shaking hands with all three of us. "I've been watching your bus campaign across Virginia all autumn from out in Iowa. Do you realize the two of us just made Senate history before we even got sworn in? Not only are there two wheelchair users in the incoming Democratic freshman class at the exact same time, we're about to triple the Senate's wheelchair caucus!"

"From coastal city buses in Virginia to front porches in Iowa," Katie grinned back at him as we positioned our chairs side by side at the front center of the incoming Democratic class for the photograph.

Monday, November 16, 2026, 11:15 AM — Senator Tess Dunmore of Illinois, Senator-Elect Josh Novak of Iowa, & Why the Senate Ramp Is Already Waiting

At quarter past eleven, while the lame-duck One Hundred Nineteenth Senate stood in morning recess, the Deputy Sergeant at Arms and two preservation architects from the Office of the Architect of the Capitol met Katie, Josh Novak, and me outside the double doors of the United States Senate Chamber on the second floor of the Capitol.

Out of pure habit from fifteen years in Virginia politics, both Katie and I had arrived ready for an architectural battle. In 2010, after Katie won her seat on the Virginia Beach City Council, we had had to fight city facilities managers to modify the Municipal Center dais. In January 2014, when Katie arrived in the Virginia House of Delegates, I had sat beside her with a twenty-five-foot steel tape measure forcing Capitol Facilities to fix non-compliant fifty-one-inch restroom stalls. And in December 2019, when she was elected to the Senate of Virginia, the master woodworkers in Richmond had had to build the chamber's very first custom-milled mahogany wheelchair ramp from scratch because no wheelchair user had ever served in the upper house of the General Assembly.

As the brass-handled doors of the United States Senate Chamber swung open onto the blue carpet, however, a familiar voice called out from the center aisle:

"Put the steel tape measure away, Nate—none of you have to fight the building engineers from scratch this time!"

Rolling briskly up the blue carpet toward us in a sleek, ultralight black titanium wheelchair was forty-eight-year-old Senator Teresa "Tess" Dunmore of Illinois—the decorated former Army helicopter pilot who had lost both of her legs when her aircraft was hit by a rocket-propelled grenade in Iraq in 2004, and who had served in the United States Senate since January of 2017.

Katie's face lit up in an instant as Senator Dunmore braked her titanium chair right in front of our two motorized SwiftChairs and Josh's manual ApexLite chair, reaching out to clasp Katie's hand, Josh's hand, and mine.

"Senator Dunmore," Katie said warmly.

"It's Tess—we're colleagues now, Katie, Josh," Senator Dunmore grinned, looking back and forth across our wheelchairs with fierce camaraderie. "Do you have any idea how long I've been waiting for reinforcements on wheels in this chamber? For the last ten years I've been a one-woman wheelchair caucus on our side of the aisle. Now, with Virginia and Iowa showing up in the same freshman class, we've got a full fleet!"

For a full two seconds, neither Katie nor I spoke. Looking down the semicircular tiers of the one hundred historic mahogany Senate desks toward the marble rostrum at the front of the chamber, I realized that for the very first time in my sister's public life, she wasn't the only wheelchair user in the room—in fact, between Tess Dunmore, Josh Novak, and Katie, three of the fifty-four Democratic Senators in the One Hundred Twentieth Congress would be rolling onto the Senate floor in wheelchairs.

"Come on down the aisle—let me show you both what we already built, and what the cabinetmakers are customizing for each of your desks before January third," Tess said, wheeling alongside Katie, Josh, and me down the Democratic side of the chamber.

At the base of the front tiers, Tess pointed to the permanent, flush-mounted carpeted wheelchair ramp leading smoothly down into the well of the Senate, and then to the custom platform lift and ramp integrated into the white marble steps of the Presiding Officer's rostrum.

"When I got sworn in back in 2017—following in the tire tracks of veterans like Dan Inouye, Bob Dole, and Max Cleland—we made sure the well of the Senate and the Presiding Officer's rostrum were permanently accessible under the Congressional Accountability Act," Tess explained. "What the Senate cabinetmakers had to figure out this week is the difference between manual titanium frames like mine and Josh's and your two motorized SwiftChairs."

She led us to the back-row aisle desks on the outer curve of the Democratic side, where two master Senate carpenters were kneeling with brass calipers and blocks of seasoned Honduras mahogany.

"Because the hundred desks on the Senate floor date back to 1819 and have bolted-down swivel chairs," I noted, leaning over my left armrest to inspect the joinery, "for Senator-Elect Novak's desk two aisles over—just like Senator Dunmore's desk—unbolting the fixed chair pedestal gives his manual wheelchair plenty of clearance. And on Katie's desk here, they unbolted the chair pedestal and milled one-and-a-half-inch solid mahogany riser blocks under the bottom of the desk legs so the upright joystick controller on Katie's right armrest glides all the way under the writing surface without bumping the drawer apron."

"You nailed it on the first look, Nate," the lead carpenter smiled, standing up as Katie nudged her right thumb forward on her joystick and rolled her SwiftChair effortlessly beneath the historic mahogany desktop, testing the clearance with an inch and a half to spare. "And right behind Senator Prairie's desk along the back leather staff bench, we've widened the staff bay by thirty-eight inches. Since Mr. Prairie holds permanent Chief Data Strategist floor privileges under your office allotment, his SwiftChair can park right behind the Senator's left shoulder during floor debate without blocking the chamber door. We're making the exact same dual-powerchair modification to the witness and staff bays in Dirksen Room 124 for the Appropriations Committee."

Then Tess Dunmore gestured toward the high white marble rostrum at the front of the chamber, a wicked gleam in her dark eyes.

"Now come up the rostrum ramp with me for thirty seconds, Katie," Tess said. "There's one more perk of our new fifty-four-seat Democratic majority you need to test-drive before the Vice President shows up this afternoon."

Katie and I followed Tess up the accessible rostrum ramp to the highest tier of the Senate dais, right behind the Presiding Officer's carved marble desk and the heavy ivory gavel block.

"Under Senate custom," Tess said, patting the leather arm of the Presiding Officer's space, "the Vice President of the United States almost never sits in this chair except on Opening Day or when the Senate is tied fifty-fifty. Instead, the freshman Senators of the majority party rotate in one-hour shifts every legislative day to preside over the Senate as Acting President pro tempore. And do you know what every single Senator on the floor—Democrat or Republican—is required by Senate Rule XIX to call you when you are sitting at this desk with that ivory gavel in your hand?"

Katie looked out across the hundred mahogany desks below us, a slow, electric smile spreading across her face.

"Madam President," Katie said softly.

"Madam President," Tess laughed aloud. "Every single Republican who cheered when Garrett Thorne stood on the South Lawn calling you 'Broken Katie Prairie' and 'a bitter little cripple on wheels' is going to have to stand at attention at their desk, look up at your SwiftChair at this rostrum, and say, 'Madam President, will the Chair recognize the Senator?' before they're even allowed to speak!"

Tuesday, November 17, 2026, 2:00 PM — The Dirksen Room 511 Suite Lottery & Committee Assignments

On Tuesday afternoon, the Office of the Senate Sergeant at Arms convened the Freshman Office Suite Lottery in the Capitol Visitor Center congressional meeting rooms.

Under the rules of the United States Senate, newly elected Senators taking office on the same day are ranked in freshman seniority by prior federal service, prior service as a state governor, and then by the population of their state in the decennial census paired with prior state legislative service. With Virginia's population of nearly nine million people and Katie's twelve combined years in the Virginia House of Delegates and the Senate of Virginia, Katie drew the second pick in the entire twelve-member freshman class.

While the other incoming Senators fought over the high-ceilinged, chandeliered corner suites in the 1909 Russell Senate Office Building, Katie and I didn't even look at the Russell list. We had already audited the Sergeant at Arms CAD floor plans on my MagnaBook Pro the night before.

"Russell was built in 1909 with heavy brass-sill double doors, narrow interior staff hallways, and long detours to the accessible elevators," I said, pointing to our annotated blueprint as the Superintendent of the Senate Office Buildings leaned over our table. "Look at the fifth floor of the Dirksen Senate Office Building—specifically Suite 511."

"Dirksen Room 511 has forty-eight-inch interior doorways, flush marble-to-carpet thresholds, a wide reception corridor where two SwiftChairs can roll side by side in lockstep without turning sideways, and a private Senator's office large enough to place two custom-height mahogany desks side by side so Nate's workstation sits two feet from my left armrest," Katie told the Superintendent. "Plus, the elevator bank right outside Room 511 drops straight down to the first-floor Appropriations Subcommittee hearing rooms in Dirksen 124 and 138 and the subterranean subway to the Capitol. We'll take Dirksen Room 511."

An hour later, when the Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee met with Katie and Senior Senator Thomas Keane to finalize committee slates for the One Hundred Twentieth Congress, the leadership didn't repeat Senator Martin Warren's mistake of underestimating her. With Naval Station Norfolk, Newport News Shipbuilding, and the Port of Virginia anchoring her home base—and Appropriations Chairman Arthur Harrington personally requesting her on his committee—Katie rolled out of the Steering meeting with three powerhouse assignments: the Senate Committee on Appropriations (including seats on the Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies Subcommittee and the Transportation, Housing and Urban Development Subcommittee), the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs (which held one hundred percent Senate jurisdiction over the Federal Transit Administration and every public transit system in America), and the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Because Katie had defeated retiring Senator Martin Warren's handpicked corporate successor in the June primary rather than inheriting a party machine, we weren't taking over a pre-packaged staff operation—we were building Senator Katie Prairie's personal office from the ground up. Following the model Senior Senator Thomas Keane used across the Commonwealth, Katie and I structured her incoming operation into two coordinated halves: a Washington legislative, administrative, scheduling, and communications staff in Dirksen Room 511, and a Virginia constituent-services operation staffed by caseworkers and geographically assigned regional directors across Hampton Roads, Richmond, the Shenandoah and New River Valleys, Northern Virginia, and a dedicated Southside and Eastern Shore Regional Director.

And before our transition team opened a single resume from Capitol Hill, Katie wrote three names at the very top of her Washington staffing chart:

“Sam, Mandy, and Sarah are coming with me.”

In the United States Senate, unlike the Senate Page Program—where sixteen- and seventeen-year-old Pages are sponsored by Senators and employed by the Sergeant at Arms—every Senator’s personal office is an independent equal-opportunity employer that sets its own positions, responsibilities, and professional salaries. At twenty-four years old, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah weren’t children anymore, and Katie would never insult their intelligence or their autism by treating them as office mascots or handing them three generic, interchangeable make-work titles. Because Katie and I were autistic ourselves, we understood something that neurotypical managers almost always got backward: for Sam, Mandy, and Sarah, successful adulthood meant interdependence, not forced separation. They didn’t need to be chained within a six-foot radius of one another every minute of the afternoon if Sam had to walk downstairs to a committee hearing room while Mandy stayed on a constituent phone call, yet they regulated and felt secure knowing they were based together in Dirksen Room 511, had workstations near one another, commuted together on Capital Transit, ate lunch together whenever they wanted, and would never have a supervisor arbitrarily split them across different cities to “teach them a lesson.”

Even more importantly, during their years working for Katie in Richmond while earning their degrees at Central Virginia University, the three triplets had developed completely distinct professional strengths—inseparable as people, not interchangeable as professionals:

For twenty-four-year-old Sam Hawkins—who had turned into an unapologetic policy gremlin capable of happily reading a three-hundred-and-twelve-page Federal Transit Administration authorization bill at eleven o’clock at night—Katie created a full-time position as Legislative Correspondent covering Transportation, Infrastructure, Disability and Accessibility Policy, and Rural Development at a starting salary of sixty-two thousand dollars, bringing him full circle from the thirteen-year-old eighth-grade Page who had carried paper bills around the Virginia House floor in 2016 to a congressional staffer drafting federal transit legislation for a United States Senator.

For twenty-four-year-old Mandy Hawkins—who had discovered in Richmond that she loved the human-facing detective work of helping everyday Virginians who were stuck inside federal and state bureaucracies—Katie offered a sixty-six-thousand-dollar position as Constituent Services Representative and Federal Caseworker, designing a crystal-clear, predictable six-step casework protocol that suited Mandy’s methodical mind down to the last checkbox: case received, Privacy Act consent paperwork, federal agency liaison contact, scheduled follow-up, constituent update, and resolution and closure.

And for twenty-four-year-old Sarah Hawkins—who had started at the front reception console handling phone lines, Capitol tour requests, visitor greeting, and mail triage before revealing a razor-sharp talent for digital accessibility and social-media graphics—Katie offered a fifty-eight-thousand-dollar position as Staff Assistant and Digital Accessibility Correspondent on a direct track into her press and legislative communications operation alongside me.

When Katie called the triplets from our transition room that Tuesday afternoon to offer all three of them the jobs in Washington, there was a ten-second stunned silence on the line before Mandy said earnestly, "Senator Katie, we want to come with you more than anything—we just told Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge we would talk to them first before we signed anything."

As Sam told us laughing the next morning, when the three of them walked into the kitchen in Danville that evening and said, "Uncle Richard, Katie offered us jobs in Washington," their sixty-six-year-old uncle set his teacup down on the counter and looked at all three of them.

"All three of you?" Richard asked.

"All three," Sam told him, listing their three distinct positions and salaries in Dirksen Room 511.

"Well, of course she does," Richard said warmly. "What did you tell her?"

Mandy blinked. "We said we needed to talk to you and Aunt Marge first."

Richard stared at his twenty-four-year-old nephew and nieces for three full seconds.

"You're twenty-four years old," the former House Majority Leader said softly. "Go call your senator."

Because Uncle Richard was their maternal uncle—their mother's brother—and the triplets carried the surname Hawkins rather than Callaway, the Washington reporters scanning Senator-Elect Prairie's initial federal transition payroll filings for Sam Hawkins, Amanda Hawkins, and Sarah Hawkins didn't immediately realize who the three twenty-four-year-old hires from Danville were related to. Forty-eight hours later, however, when a veteran Capitol beat reporter at the Richmond newspaper recognized the three names from their years in the General Assembly and cross-referenced the filing, the headline ricocheted across every newsroom in the Commonwealth: FORMER VIRGINIA GOP MAJORITY LEADER RICHARD CALLAWAY ENCOURAGES NEPHEW AND NIECES TO JOIN DEMOCRATIC SENATOR'S WASHINGTON STAFF.

By noon, television cameras were back in Uncle Richard's front yard in Southside Virginia.

"Leader Callaway," a reporter asked, holding a microphone over the porch railing, "does it bother you that your nephew and nieces will be working in Washington for a Democratic United States Senator?"

"Which Democrat?" Uncle Richard asked dryly.

"Senator-Elect Prairie."

"Katie? Lord, no," Richard chuckled, before his expression grew steady and serious. "I spent twenty-four years in the House of Delegates. I know that a newly elected United States Senator doesn't have unlimited payroll slots to hand out as sentimental favors, I know something about legislative offices, and I know something about Katie Prairie. Eleven years ago, when Sam, Mandy, and Sarah were thirteen years old and had only been living safely with Marge and me for a year, I sent them up to Richmond as House Pages worrying about them every single hour of the day—and Katie Prairie and her brother Nate looked after those kids when nobody asked them to. So when those three came home on Tuesday night and told Marge and me that Katie wanted them on her United States Senate staff, I told them to take the jobs. They're adults. They're not Republicans because I'm a Republican, and they don't owe my political party anything. But if you're asking whether I'm comfortable with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah working for Katie Prairie? I couldn't tell you another Senator in America I'd trust more with those three."

Right beside the local reporters, a correspondent holding a Liberty First Network microphone pushed forward, repeating the talking point that Restore the Republic commentators had been screaming all morning:

"Mr. Majority Leader, Restore the Republic state chapters are calling you 'RINO Richard' and 'an Enemy of the Republic,' and they're asking how a lifelong conservative could be sending his own autistic nephew and nieces to Washington after they were manipulated by 'Broken Katie Prairie'!"

At the word RINO, Uncle Richard let out a short, dry laugh.

"Twenty-four years in the Virginia House of Delegates. Republican Majority Leader. And now I'm apparently a Republican In Name Only," Richard said wryly. "That's an awfully long time to maintain the disguise."

Then his smile vanished, and the iron voice that had commanded the floor of the Virginia House for a decade rolled across his front porch as he locked eyes with the Liberty First Network correspondent.

"Sending them?" Uncle Richard said, his voice dropping an octave as every trace of diplomacy disappeared. "Let me get something straight right now. My nephew and nieces are twenty-four years old. Katie Prairie offered them jobs in the United States Senate. They wanted those jobs. They asked Marge and me what we thought, and I told them to take the jobs. Nobody stole my kids. Nobody brainwashed my kids. Nobody sent my kids anywhere."

He took one step closer to the porch railing, pointing a finger squarely at the Liberty First Network mic flag.

"And as for this 'Broken Katie Prairie' garbage?" Uncle Richard unloaded, his voice ringing like a gavel strike across the quiet Southside street. "Let me tell you something about your 'Broken Katie Prairie.' I knew Katie when my three kids were practically children. When my nephew and nieces were thirteen years old, that woman recognized when they were overwhelmed before half the adults in the Capitol did. She gave them instructions they could understand. She protected them when the House got too loud. She treated them with patience and dignity, and she never once screamed at my kids. If that's what Restore the Republic calls broken, then perhaps somebody ought to take a long look at what Restore the Republic calls whole. And if you think autism makes Katie Prairie broken, you're also talking about my nephew and my nieces—so choose your next words very carefully. You people didn't inherit my Republican Party merely because you inherited its name. If my party thinks three adults taking good jobs working for the Commonwealth is a scandal, my party knows where to find me."

That night—as Aunt Marge told Katie over the phone while laughing so hard she could barely catch her breath—Uncle Richard sat back in his recliner watching the eleven o'clock news replay his interview, rubbed his forehead, and muttered:

“Twenty-four years as a Republican in the House of Delegates. Republican Majority Leader. And somehow all three of my kids wound up working for the Democratic Senator from Virginia Beach.”

“You introduced them to Richmond,” Marge reminded him sweetly from the sofa.

Richard let out a long sigh. “...I suppose this is my fault.”

Wednesday, November 18, 2026, 4:30 PM — Face-to-Face With Vice President Conrad Drayton in the President’s Room

The final event of New Member Orientation took place at four-thirty on Wednesday afternoon inside Room S-216 of the United States Capitol—the ornate, frescoed President’s Room just off the Senate lobby—where Vice President Conrad Drayton, in his constitutional capacity as President of the Senate, was hosting the traditional ceremonial welcome reception for the Senators-Elect and their families.

To say that Katie hated Vice President Conrad Drayton—and his boss in the Oval Office, President Garrett Thorne—would have been an understatement.

For the past nine months, ever since it became clear that Katie was going to win the Virginia Senate seat, President Thorne had used every rally stage and South Lawn helicopter gaggle to mock my twin sister’s disability—calling her “Broken Katie Prairie,” mimicking the way her hands rested on her wheelchair joystick, and jeering that “a forty-one-year-old spinster on wheels who still lives with her crippled twin brother and rides city buses has no stamina for the United States Senate.” And Vice President Conrad Drayton had been even slimier: going on Patriot Watch on the Liberty First Network five nights a week to sneer with smug, sanctimonious condescension that because Katie and I were unmarried, childless, secular twins who relied on each other instead of a “traditional nuclear marriage,” we had “no moral or spiritual stake in the future of the American family.”

Now, beneath the gilded Renaissance-revival ceiling frescoes and crystal chandelier of the President’s Room, Conrad Drayton stood in a charcoal suit with a forced, oily television smile plastered across his face, shaking hands with the incoming Senators one by one in front of the official Senate photographer.

When Katie and I rolled our two compact SwiftChairs side by side through the arched doorway with Dad walking right behind us, the chatter in the small room dropped to a hush.

“Well, well—look who made it all the way up from Virginia Beach,” Vice President Drayton said smoothly, stepping across the patterned tile floor toward Katie’s wheelchair with his right hand extended and his left hand reaching out automatically toward the rear push-handle bar behind her headrest to angle her chair toward the camera lens. “President Thorne and I were taking bets on whether you’d actually roll all the way up Interstate 95, Senator-Elect Prairie.”

Katie nudged her joystick half an inch in reverse and pivoted twenty degrees to the left—just enough that Conrad Drayton’s left hand closed on empty air six inches from her chair.

“First of all, Mr. Vice President, nobody touches my wheelchair or my brother’s wheelchair without our permission,” Katie said, her voice calm, crisp, and loud enough that every Senator-Elect in the room heard every syllable. “Second, we didn’t drive up Interstate 95—we took the morning train from Norfolk and rode the Capital Transit Yellow Line across the river, which you’d know if anyone in your administration ever set foot on public transportation.”

Conrad Drayton’s jaw tightened, a flash of ugly crimson rising above his starched white collar as he pulled his hand back.

“I’m sure you’ll find Washington very different from the Virginia Beach bus stops, Senator-Elect,” Drayton said coldly, trying to recover his smirk in front of the photographer. “Enjoy the reception—I’ll see you on January third when I administer the oath. I assume my protocol clerk can put you down for the standard King James Bible?”

Katie didn’t flinch. Sitting tall in her royal-blue blazer between Dad and me, she looked straight up into the eyes of the man she despised and smiled—a bright, razor-sharp smile of pure constitutional triumph.

“Actually, Mr. Vice President, my transition counsel filed my formal oath notice with the Secretary of the Senate and your protocol office at nine o’clock this morning,” Katie said pleasantly. “Pursuant to Article VI, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States and Title 5, Section 3331 of the United States Code, I am not using a Bible, and I am not saying the words ‘So help me God.’ I am taking the solemn secular affirmation of office—‘Do you solemnly affirm’—with my left hand resting on a bound copy of the Constitution of the United States of America.”

For a full second, the polished television mask slipped right off Conrad Drayton’s face, replaced by a look of pure, seething hatred.

More than anything else, Drayton hated that she was swearing in on the Constitution of the United States. His entire political brand on the Liberty First Network depended on wrapping himself in sanctimonious religious theater and accusing anyone who disagreed with him of hating America—and by placing her left palm squarely on the United States Constitution under Article VI, Clause 3 while forcing him, as President of the Senate, to read the secular affirmation card aloud without “So help me God,” Katie was turning him into an involuntary participant in her secular oath in front of every camera in the country.

“You really think thumbing your nose at the Holy Bible is going to play well outside your little progressive bubble, Senator-Elect?” Drayton hissed, his voice dropping low and venomous. “Between refusing to touch a Bible, getting an F grade from the National Firearms Association down in Fairfax for calling the MR-15 a weapon of war, pushing government universal healthcare, wanting men in women’s sports and men in women’s restrooms, and pushing unrestricted abortion, you’re going to have every church and gun owner in the country marching outside your office.”

“Oh, I’m counting on it—in fact, I wear every single bit of their outrage, and that F grade from the National Firearms Association, as a badge of honor,” Katie replied without missing a beat, her voice ringing clear and unbothered across the room. “An MR-15 is a weapon of war designed for a battlefield, not a civilian neighborhood, and if calling an MR-15 a weapon of war and passing common-sense gun safety legislation—universal background checks, red-flag laws, safe storage, and keeping weapons of war out of Virginia classrooms and grocery stores so children come home alive from school—is why the gun lobby in Fairfax gave me an F, then I'll frame that F and hang it right on the door of Dirksen Room 511. Healthcare should be a universal human right for every person in this country, transgender Americans deserve the exact same dignity and bodily autonomy as everyone else without your Restore the Republic talking points bullying kids or trying to station government bathroom police outside public restrooms like your party tried and failed to do in Virginia back in 2016, and abortion is a private medical decision between a woman and her doctor—where neither you, nor President Thorne, nor any senator belongs in the exam room."

She tilted her chin up from her SwiftChair, her blue eyes gleaming as she delivered the final twist of the knife.

"And every time the televangelists at The 777 Circle down on Indian River Road in Virginia Beach tried to attack me in 2014 and 2020 for affirming my oath on the Constitution instead of a Bible, we won re-election by an even bigger margin, because ordinary voters understand that a Senator is elected to defend the Constitution, not run a church," Katie said. "Do you know what the very best part of winning this election is, Mr. Vice President?"

Katie leaned an inch forward in her SwiftChair, her voice dropping to a clear, surgical purr that made three neighboring Senators-Elect bite the insides of their cheeks to keep from laughing aloud.

"For the last nine months, your boss has gone on television calling me 'Broken Katie Prairie,' and for the last two weeks since Election Night he's been screaming on cable news that a woman in a wheelchair couldn't possibly have won by three hundred and sixty thousand votes without 'stealing the vote'—ignoring the sixteen years I've served on the Virginia Beach City Council, in the Virginia House of Delegates, and in the Senate of Virginia, and ignoring the paper ballots that the State Board of Elections and your own party's county registrars already verified," Katie said. "And yet at twelve o'clock noon on Sunday, January third, Article I, Section 3, Clause 4 of the Constitution of the United States gives you zero choice. You have to stand right in front of my wheelchair in the Old Senate Chamber, hold the card with the secular affirmation printed on it, leave 'So help me God' out of your mouth, and personally swear 'Broken Katie Prairie' into the United States Senate while my hand rests on the Constitution. I've had January third circled on my calendar since Election Night, Mr. Vice President. See you at noon."

Nudging her joystick in tandem with mine, Katie didn't even wait for his reply. We spun our two SwiftChairs one hundred and eighty degrees in unison on the tiled floor of the President's Room and rolled side by side out into the marble Senate corridor with Dad grinning from ear to ear behind us, leaving the Vice President of the United States standing frozen under the chandelier.

Part 4: Opposing Leader Schuman, The 211–204 Lame-Duck False Dawn in the Dirksen Basement, & Home Across the Fenwick Bridge

Date: 2026-12-01 at 10:30 America/New_York

Tuesday, December 1, 2026, 10:30 AM — Objecting to Unanimous Acclamation & Publicly Opposing Senator Charles Schuman for Majority Leader

“Without objection, the Secretary of the Caucus will cast a single unanimous ballot by acclamation electing Senator Charles Schuman of New York as Majority Leader for the One Hundred Twentieth Congress—”

“Madam Chair, I object to unanimous acclamation and request a recorded ballot.”

Every single fountain pen and coffee cup inside the closed mahogany doors of the Mansfield Room froze in midair.

Along the back aisle of the gilded caucus room—where the Sergeant at Arms had cleared a dual wheelchair bay beside Senator Tess Dunmore of Illinois and Senator-Elect Josh Novak of Iowa so my SwiftChair could park right alongside Katie’s left wheel under her permanent sensory-and-mobility accommodation—fifty-three sitting and incoming Democratic Senators turned in their chairs at the exact same instant to stare at my forty-one-year-old twin sister.

Up at the front head table beneath the crystal chandelier, seventy-six-year-old Senator Charles Schuman of New York blinked over the rims of his half-moon reading glasses, his smile stiffening in disbelief. Having led the Senate Democratic Caucus and controlled its campaign checkbook for two decades, Senator Schuman had walked into the first Tuesday caucus meeting after the Thanksgiving break expecting a ninety-second coronation by applause.

“Does the Senator-Elect from Virginia wish to be heard before the clerks distribute paper ballots?” the Caucus Secretary asked carefully.

“Briefly, Madam Chair,” Katie said, keeping her hands resting calmly on the armrests of her compact SwiftChair as she looked straight up the center aisle at Senator Schuman without a trace of hostility or nerves. “Two weeks ago across the Capitol Rotunda, our colleagues in the House Democratic Caucus met a historic midterm mandate by electing fresh generational leadership in Speaker-Designate Clara Morales. My brother and I spent the last ten months riding public buses across all ninety-five counties and thirty-eight independent cities of Virginia, and the working people who delivered us a fifty-four-seat Senate majority didn’t send us here to run the exact same K Street consultant playbook for another decade. Nothing in this vote is personal toward Senator Schuman, and I intend to work shoulder to shoulder with every member of this caucus to pass our legislative calendar. However, new generational leadership is overdue in both Houses of Congress—and after the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spent fourteen million dollars of Super PAC and corporate lobbyist money trying to defeat our grassroots campaign in Virginia’s June primary, nobody back home in Hampton Roads, Richmond, or Southwest Virginia sent me to Washington to rubber-stamp party leadership by voice acclamation.”

Beside Katie’s right wheel, Josh Novak gave a quiet, approving nod from his ultralight manual ApexLite chair, while two rows ahead of us, Senior Senator Thomas Keane of Virginia folded his arms with the faint, unmistakable trace of a proud half-smile.

Fifteen minutes later, after the caucus clerks collected the folded paper slips in a mahogany ballot box and tallied the count at the front table, the entrenched seniority machine held—but the myth of unanimous obedience did not. Senator Charles

Schuman was re-elected incoming Senate Majority Leader by a vote of forty-three to eleven, with Katie, Josh Novak, and nine other reform-minded Senators casting their ballots for generational change.

Under the unwritten traditions of Capitol Hill, nine of those eleven dissenting Senators slipped quietly out the side corridor afterward, content to let their protest stay sealed behind closed caucus doors.

Katie didn't do unwritten Washington traditions.

When the tall double doors of the Mansfield Room swung open onto the second-floor marble Senate corridor, forty boom microphones and television camera lenses surged forward against the velvet stanchion rope. Instead of wheeling past the press gaggle, Katie steered her SwiftChair right up to the brass microphone stand with me braking beside her left armrest.

"Senator-Elect Prairie!" a correspondent from The Potomac Post called out over the shutter clicks. "Word just came out of the room that someone objected to electing Leader Schuman by voice acclamation and forced a ballot—was that you, and how did you vote?"

"Yes, I objected to unanimous acclamation, and I voted No on Senator Schuman for Majority Leader," Katie answered plainly into the microphones, her blue eyes steady and completely unbothered. "Voters across Virginia and across the country just asked for a new generation of leadership in both chambers of Congress, just as House Democrats recognized when they elevated Speaker-Designate Clara Morales. Senator Schuman won the caucus vote fairly, forty-three to eleven, and we're going to work together to govern and protect working families starting at noon on January third. At the same time, Virginians deserve to know how their Senator votes in every room—not just when the television cameras are turned on—and the K Street donor apparatus that spent fourteen million dollars against us in June doesn't own my voice in December."

"Aren't you worried about retaliation on your freshman committee assignments before you're even sworn in?" an Associated Wire reporter shouted from the second row.

Before Katie even needed to answer, the double doors behind us parted again, and Appropriations Chairman Arthur Harrington walked straight up behind Katie's right shoulder alongside Virginia's Senior Senator, Thomas Keane.

"Senator-Elect Prairie's seats on Appropriations, Banking, and Commerce are locked in solid granite," Chairman Harrington rumbled dryly into the microphones, resting a brief, collegial hand on Senator Keane's arm rather than touching Katie's wheelchair. "In fact, half the voters in my state wish they'd thought of forcing a recorded vote first. Excuse us, folks—we have a transition budget to write."

As Katie and I pivoted our SwiftChairs away from the stunned press pack toward the Capitol subway elevator, Senator Schuman himself emerged into the hallway twenty feet behind us—catching Katie's eye over the heads of his aides with the sober, newly careful expression of a Majority Leader who had just learned on Day Zero that the incoming junior Senator from Virginia could neither be bought nor intimidated.

Tuesday, December 1, 2026, 2:15 PM — Basement Cubicle SD-B14, The 211–204 Motion to Refer, & The Pentagon's Premature Victory Lap

Down in Room SD-B14 in the windowless basement level of the Dirksen Senate Office Building that afternoon, the overhead fluorescent tubes hummed softly above painted off-white cinderblock walls, six unpacked brown cardboard boxes of Riddick's Senate Procedure, and two dented gray metal government desks borrowed from Sergeant at Arms surplus.

Outside Washington, most people assumed that the morning after you won a United States Senate election, somebody handed you the keys to a sunlit marble suite overlooking the Capitol dome. In reality, because the One Hundred Nineteenth Congress remained in constitutional session until twelve o'clock noon on January third—and retiring Senator Martin Warren's staff was still occupying Dirksen Room 511 five floors above our heads while packing up eighteen years of files—every newly elected Senator without prior Capitol office space spent November and December crammed into a basement transition "swing suite" barely wide enough for our two compact SwiftChairs to turn around beside the filing cabinets.

Not a single oil painting hung on our cinderblock walls. The only decoration in the entire room sat leaning against the concrete block at the back corner of Katie's borrowed metal desk: the glossy red-and-black attack postcard from the National Firearms Association in Fairfax branding her "F-Rated Radical Katie Prairie," sealed inside the ten-dollar black wooden frame we had brought up from Virginia Beach. Across the narrow aisle, twenty-four-year-old triplets Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins sat shoulder to shoulder at a folding laminate table sorting stacks of Virginia regional caseworker resumes from Hampton Roads, Roanoke, and the Shenandoah Valley alongside blank federal SF-86 background-investigation packets.

Up on the cinderblock wall ahead of Katie's desk and mine, we had the forty-inch Capitol Network monitor switched on with the volume muted and closed captions scrolling across the bottom as the electronic voting clock above the House press gallery counted down to zero.

Less than twenty-four hours earlier, on Monday afternoon, an outgoing Republican congressman from Kentucky's Ohio River valley named Thomas Mayfield—a fiercely independent constitutional stickler who had broken with President Garrett Thorne over unauthorized overseas military strikes and congressional war powers, only to lose his spring Republican primary to a challenger personally bankrolled by Thorne's political machine and cheered on by Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson—had walked onto the House floor and shocked leadership in both parties by reading a privileged eight-article impeachment resolution against Secretary Halverson.

Under the rules of the House of Representatives, a privileged impeachment resolution called up from the floor forced leadership to act within two legislative days. Rather than risking an up-or-down vote on the merits of Halverson's conduct, lame-duck House Speaker Paul Jennings of Louisiana—who had gone before the morning cameras dismissing Mayfield's eight articles as a "political gambit for attention"—had pulled the only procedural emergency brake left in the rulebook: moving immediately to refer the entire impeachment resolution to the outgoing House Judiciary Committee, where the lame-duck chairman could lock it inside a desk drawer until the One Hundred Nineteenth Congress expired at noon on January third.

Katie reached her left hand across the two-inch gap between our SwiftChair armrests and laced her fingers through mine as the presiding officer's gavel fell on the screen.

On the left half of the split-screen broadcast, the green and red numbers locked into place on the chamber tally board: 211 Yeas to 204 Nays.

"Seven votes," Sam Hawkins murmured from the folding table behind us, adjusting his glasses as I refreshed the Clerk of the House roll-call XML feed on the unbranded matte-aluminum screen of my MagnaBook Pro. "Eighteen members missed the roll call—eleven Democrats, including a representative whose shuttle got trapped behind a Capitol Police bus escort on Independence Avenue right as the gavel came down, and seven lame-duck Republicans who didn't want their names anywhere near either column. Every single Democrat on the floor voted Nay against burying the articles, and Representative Mayfield crossed the aisle as the lone Republican Nay."

"Look at the floor podium replay from ten minutes before the roll opened," Sarah Hawkins said quietly, pointing toward the caption transcript scrolling down her tablet. "Representative Mayfield warned his own Republican conference right to their faces that burying his privileged resolution in the lame-duck Judiciary Committee was only temporary—he called his articles 'a much gentler version of what's coming' once Speaker-Designate Clara Morales and the new majority take the gavels in January with full committee and subpoena power."

Within ten minutes, the right half of the muted basement television screen cut live across the Potomac to the Pentagon briefing room.

Stepping briskly up to the blue briefing podium beneath the Department of Defense seal—holding his first Pentagon press conference in more than six months—was Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson, his hair freshly lacquered under the television lights from his decade hosting Patriot Watch Weekend on the Liberty First Network. Even with the volume muted, the swagger rolling off the screen was unmistakable as the closed-captioning stenographer struggled to keep pace with him. Gripping both edges of the lectern with a triumphant grin, Halverson declared "total victory," sneering that the eight impeachment articles were a "stunt" and a "circus" staged by a sore-loser congressman, insisting that every military operation cited in the resolution was lawful, ordered by President Garrett Thorne, and properly notified to Congress. Below him on the broadcast ticker, statements from the White House flashed in succession as President Thorne congratulated his Defense Secretary and Vice President Conrad Drayton posted online that critics were only targeting Halverson because he "took on the bureaucracy at the Pentagon."

"They actually think they beat it," Mandy Hawkins said softly from behind her stack of constituent casework binders. "He's standing at the Pentagon podium taking a victory lap over a seven-vote referral motion."

"Let him celebrate," I said, tapping two keys on my MagnaBook Pro to archive the certified Clerk roll-call sheet—where two hundred and eleven names were now etched permanently into the Congressional Record voting to bury eight articles of impeachment without a single witness or document request—right alongside the timestamped video capture of Halverson's Pentagon briefing inside our encrypted oversight directory. “A motion to refer doesn’t acquit anybody of anything. Every pending committee referral in the One Hundred Nineteenth Congress evaporates into thin air when the clock strikes twelve o’clock noon on Sunday, January third.”

Beside me, Katie didn’t take her eyes off Halverson’s smirking face on the muted basement monitor.

“Back in January of last year, when I rolled into the well of the Senate of Virginia in Richmond and urged both of our Senators to vote No on confirming a weekend cable talk-show host to run the Pentagon, Bret Halverson went back on his old television network after Vice President Drayton broke the fifty-fifty tie and laughed that nobody in Washington cared what a little state senator on wheels thought,” Katie said evenly, squeezing my hand once before turning her SwiftChair back toward our stack of Appropriations defense-oversight briefing books. “Had Representative Mayfield’s snap resolution passed this afternoon in forty-eight hours without a single hearing record, Senators at a trial would have complained that the House rushed the evidence without depositions or subpoenas. Instead, thirty-three days from today, the new House Judiciary and Armed Services chairs get to pull those exact articles off the shelf with full federal subpoena power—and a man like Bret Halverson, convinced after today that he’s untouchable, is going to spend the next five weeks acting like nobody can ever touch him.”

Tuesday, December 1, 2026, 5:15 PM — Why We Avoid Union Station, State Senator Charles R. Fenwick’s Bridge, & The West Side of the Tracks on Sunset Drive

By quarter past five, true December darkness was already settling over Capitol Hill beneath a clear indigo twilight sky as Katie and I said goodnight to Sam, Mandy, and Sarah—watching the triplets head cheerfully down the corridor together to catch their bus—and steered our two SwiftChairs out the accessible ground-level Dirksen exit onto the crisp winter sidewalk along First Street Southeast.

Half a block north toward Constitution and Massachusetts Avenues, a solid river of red brake lights stretched toward the white granite colonnade of Washington Union Station as town cars, black government SUVs, and taxicabs idled bumper to bumper in the evening rush.

Whenever Capitol Hill staffers or reporters learned that Katie and I rode ARTS trains up from Norfolk and commuted by rail every day, nine out of ten of them automatically assumed we used Washington Union Station. In truth, Katie and I avoided Union Station like the plague unless a specific western mountain train left us no other stop on the map. For two autistic forty-one-year-olds who had just spent ten straight hours absorbing caucus debates, camera flashes, and basement fluorescent glare, Union Station at five-thirty on a weekday evening was a cavernous sensory ambush: booming public-address speakers reverberating off ninety-foot barrel-vaulted ceilings, twenty tracks of screeching steel wheel flanges, surging retail food-court crowds, and cab horns blaring across Columbus Circle.

Here at the corner of First and C Streets Southeast, by contrast, the street-level glass elevator at Capitol South Station sat calm and uncrowded beside the brown Capital Transit pylon striped with Blue, Orange, and Silver.

Katie and I tapped our blue plastic CapitalPass cards against the circular target on the wide accessible faregate, rolled onto the mezzanine elevator down to the vaulted underground platform, and boarded a westbound Blue Line train with plenty of room to lock our wheelchair brakes side by side in the center bay. Three stops later at L'Enfant Plaza, we glided smoothly off the train, rode the center-island elevator up one level to the perpendicular upper-level tracks, and rolled straight onto a southbound Virginia-bound Yellow Line train just before the two-tone door chime sounded.

Two minutes after leaving L'Enfant Plaza, the dark concrete walls of the Seventh Street tunnel dropped away completely, and our Yellow Line car soared out into the open evening air high above the Potomac River on the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge.

Outside the wide glass window beside our armrests, the dark winter river shimmered with reflections of the illuminated white marble Jefferson Memorial behind us and the amber runway approach lights of Washington National Airport ahead along the Virginia shoreline. Immediately to our right, across the narrow strip of dark water separating the twin rail tracks from the Fourteenth Street highway spans, three solid lanes of black sedans and commuter SUVs sat virtually motionless in bumper-to-bumper bridge traffic while our silver railcar glided past them at fifty miles an hour.

"I guarantee you not one in fifty Senators sitting in those town cars next door—and zero K Street lobbyists—could tell you the name of this bridge if you put a hundred-dollar bill on the table," I said to Katie, leaning my shoulder lightly toward the cool glass as the welded rail joints clicked rhythmically beneath our wheels.

Katie smiled, her reflection warm in the twilight window beside mine.

"They think all four spans across the river are just 'the Fourteenth Street Bridge,'" Katie agreed softly. "Almost nobody in Washington knows that on April thirtieth, 1983—the exact Saturday the first Yellow Line trains rolled across the Potomac into Northern Virginia—this rail bridge was officially named the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge, after Virginia State Senator Charles R. Fenwick of Arlington."

"A member of the Senate of Virginia," I grinned, squeezing her hand across our armrests. "Who stood up on Capitol Square in Richmond back in the nineteen-fifties and sixties, authored the legislation creating the Northern Virginia Transportation Commission, and negotiated the interstate compact that built this entire regional subway system so Virginians wouldn't be trapped in highway gridlock forever."

"From one Virginia State Senator's bridge to the next," Katie murmured, watching the Virginia shoreline rush up to meet our train.

Twelve minutes later, after gliding past National Airport, Potomac Yard, and Braddock Road, our Yellow Line train braked smoothly alongside the elevated concrete island platform of King Street–Old Town Station in Alexandria, right beneath the illuminated stepped stone tower of the George Washington Masonic National Memorial rising atop Shooter's Hill.

We took the platform elevator down to the quiet brick plaza, tapped our CapitalPass cards out through the wide gate, and rolled side by side past the red-brick 1905 depot of Alexandria Union Station toward the stone-and-steel railroad underpass spanning King Street.

For sixty feet underneath that railroad bridge, the low rumble of a northbound commuter train echoed overhead—and then the instant our front caster wheels rolled clear out the western side of the underpass onto the west side of the tracks, the bustle of Old Town restaurants and station buses vanished behind the embankment as if someone had turned down a studio fader.

One short, level brick-sidewalk block west of the tracks, we turned the corner onto Sunset Drive.

Up at the top of the gentle wooden wheelchair ramp leading to the front porch of our dad's paid-off two-story brick house, the brass coach lamp was already glowing amber in the December chill. Before my thumb even reached the doorbell button, our sixty-eight-year-old dad pulled the front oak door wide open in his wool cardigan, letting the warm scent of homemade chicken vegetable soup and fresh rosemary roll out onto the porch.

"Right on the five-fifty-two Yellow Line schedule," Dad beamed, stepping back across the foyer rug so Katie and I could wheel side by side into the warm hallway—right past our newly installed interior vertical platform wheelchair lift waiting quietly beside the stairs to carry us up to our three-desk study in Bedroom 4 after supper. "Wash up, Senator-Elect. How was Day One of the December lame duck?"

Katie clicked off her powerchair drive motor inside the warm foyer, unbuttoned her winter coat, and looked back through the front window toward the quiet railroad embankment a block away—knowing that every single night the United States Senate stood in session for the next six years, she wouldn't be sleeping in a Georgetown salon or a Capitol Hill luxury condo across the river; she would cross underneath the tracks on Sunset Drive and sleep at home in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

"Productive, Dad," Katie smiled, reaching over to pat my forearm as the three of us headed into the kitchen. "Everybody in Washington knows where we stand—and we're right on time for dinner."

The Minified ZIP File, The Raw HTML Takedown, & Resigning from Richmond

Part 1: The Minified ZIP Trick, Barely Commented Code, & The Live WCAG Takedown

Date: 2026-12-11 at 10:00 America/New_York

Friday, December 11, 2026, 10:00 AM — Static MagnaPad Slides & The Minified ZIP Trick in Dirksen

"You don't need to worry your head about the technical weeds, Senator-Elect—our engineering team in Rosslyn handles all the magic behind the curtain! Just tell us if you like this shade of Senate navy blue on the banner!"

Sitting across the polished mahogany conference table in our temporary transition suite in the Dirksen Senate Office Building, Bradford Vance—the Senior Account Director for Capitol Digital Solutions, one of the beltway IT contractors approved by the Office of the Senate Sergeant at Arms to build official United States Senate constituent websites—beamed with patronizing self-satisfaction as he tapped a static PDF slide deck on his MagnaPad tablet. Beside him sat his junior project manager, Evan, while a black triangular conference speakerphone sat in the center of the table with their lead developers dialed in live from their Rosslyn office across the Potomac.

Four days earlier, on Monday, December 7, the Virginia State Board of Elections had met in Richmond under Code of Virginia Section 24.2-679 to formally certify the November 3 general election results, and the Governor had transmitted Katie's signed Certificate of Election to the Secretary of the United States Senate.

Now, on Friday morning, Katie and I had ridden the morning ARTS train up from Norfolk, detrained on the mobile lift at Alexandria to drop our overnight bags at Dad's two-story brick house on Sunset Drive—where our newly installed interior vertical platform wheelchair lift was already humming smoothly between the first floor and our upstairs three-desk office in Bedroom 4—and taken the Capital Transit Yellow Line across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge into the District for our ten o'clock website sign-off meeting.

Under United States Senate Internet Services rules, a Senator's official government constituent website had to be strictly separated from our campaign website, which Katie and I had coded ourselves in PHP, and hosted inside the Sergeant at Arms environment using an approved vendor template.

Watching Bradford talk down to my forty-one-year-old twin sister in the exact overly bright, sing-song voice that non-technical consultants often used when they saw two adults sitting in compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs, I didn't say a word. I just kept my hands resting lightly beside my closed MagnaBook Pro and waited for Katie to lower the boom.

"I don't approve websites from static PDF pictures on a MagnaPad, Bradford," Katie said evenly, folding her hands in the lap of her royal-blue blazer without even glancing at his tablet screen. "Before I put my name on a federal domain that sixty thousand disabled veterans, blind commuters, and working families across Virginia are going to use to request constituent casework, my brother Nate and I want to audit the raw HTML, CSS, and JavaScript source code. Please have your build team on the speakerphone drop the staging repository onto our transition VLAN share folder right now."

Bradford blinked twice, his rehearsed sales smile flickering as he exchanged an amused glance with Evan. Clearly, he assumed some twenty-two-year-old campaign intern had fed the incoming Senator a technical buzzword to sound tough.

"Well, Senator-Elect, normally congressional offices just sign the design approval form and let our certified engineers handle the code," Bradford chuckled condescendingly, leaning toward the triangular speakerphone in the center of the table. "Trevor, are you and the build team hearing this in Rosslyn? The Senator-Elect wants to see a copy of the code before she signs off. Go ahead and drop a ZIP file of the build into her transition share drive so we can check that box."

Over the speakerphone, we heard a muffled snicker from the Rosslyn engineering bullpen—the unmistakable sound of developers who thought a United States Senator wouldn't know an HTML tag from a spreadsheet macro—followed by Trevor's voice:

"Sure thing, Brad. Give me ten seconds… alright, I just dropped prairie-senate-prod-bundle.zip into the Dirksen transition share folder for her."

Friday, December 11, 2026, 10:15 AM — "Why Is a U.S. Senator Speaking Our Exact Engineering Language?"

Katie and I opened the unbranded matte-aluminum lids of our two MagnaBook Pro laptops at the exact same second.

Without touching a mouse, I mounted the local Senate transition VLAN share in my MagnaOS terminal, unzipped prairie-senate-prod-bundle.zip into our shared workspace, and pushed the extracted directory straight across our local peer link to Katie's machine.

Beside me, Katie hit Command and Space, launched Quantum Code—QCode—and opened the extracted folder across two vertical editor panes.

Bradford's patronizing smile vanished the instant he saw the dark syntax-highlighted IDE panes snap open across both of our screens. "Wait… is that Quantum Code?"

Neither Katie nor I answered him, because both of us were staring at the three files Trevor had packed into the ZIP archive: index.min.html, styles.min.css, and app.min.js.

Every single file had been run through an aggressive production minifier. All line breaks, indentation, and whitespace had been stripped out, crushing thousands of lines of code into a single continuous horizontal wall of characters, with every JavaScript variable and function mangled into single-letter identifiers without a single source map in the directory.

Sitting in her SwiftChair, Katie's blue eyes narrowed to ice. She leaned six inches forward toward the black triangular speakerphone in the center of the mahogany table.

"Trevor," Katie said, her voice cutting through the speakerphone mesh with razor-sharp precision. "Did your build team seriously just send a United States Senator-Elect a webpack-minified production bundle with stripped whitespace, mangled single-letter AST identifiers, concatenated CSS rules, and zero source maps because you thought I wouldn't know the difference between compiled build artifacts and raw source code?"

Across the table, Bradford's jaw literally dropped open.

Over the speakerphone, the muffled background chatter in the Rosslyn engineering bullpen stopped dead. For four full seconds, the only sound coming through the speaker was stunned, ragged breathing.

“Uh… wait—who is this speaking?” Trevor stammered over the line, completely bewildered. “Brad, did the Senator-Elect bring an outside DevOps engineer from the Sergeant at Arms office into the room?”

“No, Trevor, this is Senator-Elect Katie Prairie speaking to you, and my twin brother Nate is sitting right beside me with the exact same minified garbage open in Quantum Code,” Katie snapped. “I didn’t ask for your minified production output. I asked for your raw, unminified source repository—the actual human-readable HTML templates, uncompiled stylesheets, and unminified JavaScript controllers before your bundler strips the tree. Drop the raw unminified repository into the VLAN folder in the next sixty seconds, or I am calling the Senate Sergeant at Arms contract officer to cancel your task order before lunch.”

“Yes, ma’am—right away, Senator-Elect! Exporting the raw source branch right now!” Trevor blurted out over the speakerphone, his voice pitching up an octave as frantic keyboard clacking echoed from Rosslyn.

Across the mahogany table, a bead of sweat rolled down Bradford Vance’s temple as he stared in utter disbelief at a forty-one-year-old Senator in a power wheelchair who had just dismantled his lead engineer in fluent full-stack developer shop talk.

Friday, December 11, 2026, 10:25 AM — Twin Fury Over Barely Commented Code & Every WCAG Failure in the Book

Forty seconds later, a new archive—prairie-senate-raw-src.zip—appeared in the network share.

I extracted the raw source tree in terminal, opened header.html, casework-form.html, styles.css, and nav-controller.js across my Quantum Code workspace, and glanced over at Katie as she opened the exact same files on her MagnaBook Pro.

The longer the two of us scrolled down those unminified files, the hotter our faces burned. Within two minutes, both Katie and I were flat-out furious.

“Nate, look at nav-controller.js and casework-form.html,” Katie said, her voice vibrating with the cold, surgical fury of a senior software architect who had just uncovered fraud. “There are almost no code comments in this entire repository!”

“Four thousand two hundred lines of unminified HTML, CSS, and JavaScript, and I just ran a grep across the whole source tree,” I said angrily, leaning toward the speakerphone so Trevor and his entire Rosslyn team could hear every word. “You have exactly three inline comment lines in the entire project—and one of them on line eighty-four of nav-controller.js literally says TODO: fix keyboard trap later dated four years ago! There isn’t a single architectural block comment at the top of your files, zero function docblocks explaining your state logic, and zero inline comments documenting your DOM event listeners. How is any developer supposed to maintain taxpayer-funded code that isn’t even commented?!”

“And the reason you tried to hide it behind a minified ZIP file is even worse,” Katie said, pointing her finger straight at her laptop screen while Bradford and Evan shrank back into their leather chairs across the table. “This website as written fails almost every single WCAG accessibility pointer there is!”

Over the speakerphone, Trevor tried to stammer a defense: “S-Senator-Elect, I assure you our template passed our internal visual QA check—”

“Don’t you dare talk to me about a visual QA check when I am looking at your raw DOM tree line by line!” Katie fired back. “Let’s start at the top of header.html. You have no skip-navigation link anywhere in the header, which violates WCAG 2.4.1 Bypass Blocks and forces every keyboard and switch user to tab through forty-two navigation links on every single page load. Your heading hierarchy jumps straight from an H1 banner title to an H4 subheader because your designer used heading tags for font sizing instead of semantic structure, violating WCAG 1.3.1 Info and Relationships. And look at line forty-seven of header.html!”

Katie read the offending markup aloud like a prosecutor reading an indictment into the federal record:

“You wrapped the entire Help With a Federal Agency constituent dropdown menu inside nested generic div tags with an inline onclick attribute—zero semantic button element, zero aria-expanded state, zero aria-controls binding, and no tabindex! Do you know what that means? It means a blind veteran using a screen reader, or a quadriplegic Virginian navigating with a Sip-and-Puff switch or a keyboard Tab key, cannot even open the menu to ask their United States Senator for help with the VA!”

“And look at line one hundred twelve of styles.css,” I added fiercely, scrolling my right-hand pane down the stylesheet. “Somebody on your team wrote a global wildcard rule setting focus outlines to none with an !important flag across the entire website! You literally stripped the visible keyboard focus ring off every link and form control on the page—a blatant violation of WCAG 2.4.7 Focus Visible and federal Section 508 law!”

“Wait until you hear what happens on casework-form.html at line two hundred four,” Katie said grimly.

That page was the Federal Casework Privacy Act Release Form—the most important page on any Senator’s website, where disabled constituents, seniors, and military families submit requests for help with delayed Social Security checks, Medicare power-wheelchair prior authorizations, and veterans’ benefits.

“Instead of associating explicit HTML label elements with your form inputs using a for attribute, your developers just typed instructions into light-gray placeholder attributes colored hex 999999 on a white background—a 2.6-to-1 contrast ratio that fails WCAG 1.4.3 Contrast Minimum AND fails WCAG 3.3.2 Labels or Instructions,” Katie said. “And because you stripped the labels, listen to what a blind constituent actually hears when they try to fill out your form.”

Katie pressed Command and F5 on her MagnaBook Pro keyboard to turn on MagnaVoice—the built-in MagnaOS screen reader—turned her laptop speakers up to maximum volume right beside the conference speakerphone, and hit the Tab key four times.

Across the mahogany table and straight through the open speakerphone line into the Rosslyn engineering bullpen, the synthesized MagnaVoice voice echoed in the dead-silent room:

“Edit text, blank. Edit text, blank. Image, hero-banner-final-v3.jpg. Unlabeled button.”

Nobody on the other side of the table or on the speakerphone dared to breathe.

Katie pressed Command and F5 to silence MagnaVoice and looked straight across the table at Bradford before addressing the speakerphone.

“S-Senator-Elect…” Trevor whispered over the speakerphone, sounding completely shell-shocked. “How on earth do you and your brother know how to audit raw unminified HTML, CSS specificity, DOM accessibility trees, and WCAG pointers like senior software engineers?”

“Because my brother Nate and I learned how to write raw HTML in seventh grade at Morrison Middle School back in 1997—which is what inspired our dad to go back to school at the Community College of Hampton Roads to earn his computer science degree,” Katie said, her voice ringing with every year of our lives. “We learned Quantum Basic 6.0 alongside our dad in 2001, we rolled into the Web Applications Developer lab at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville in March 2007 after refusing to let their evaluators steer two associate-degree holders into being ValueMart door greeters, we copied the entire PHP and SQL curriculum onto our own laptops when VITA’s state computers were too locked down to run modern code, and we have spent the last nineteen years building and maintaining production websites and desktop applications from these two wheelchairs! Did your company actually sign a federal VPAT certifying to the Senate Sergeant at Arms that this uncommented, inaccessible garbage complies with Section 508 of the Rehabilitation Act, or did you just assume a Senator in a wheelchair wouldn’t know how to read your source code?”

Bradford swallowed hard, wiping his forehead with a linen handkerchief. “Senator-Elect, I… we will assign a remediation sprint immediately—”

“You don’t need to assign a remediation sprint, because Nate and I don’t trust your team to write clean code without supervision,” Katie said, her fingers already flying across her mechanical laptop keyboard in tandem with mine. “Sit quietly for twenty-five minutes while we show you how professional Web Applications Developers write and document accessible code.”

For the next twenty-five minutes, while Bradford and Evan sat frozen in their suits and the entire Rosslyn engineering bullpen watched our live screen-share in humbled silence, Katie and I refactored their core templates in Quantum Code. We replaced every non-semantic div dropdown with proper semantic HTML5 nav and button elements bound to clean ARIA state toggles, restored high-contrast focus-visible rings, bound explicit label elements and 4.5-to-1 contrast tokens to every single input on the constituent casework form, and padded the top of every file and every single logic block with comprehensive architectural block comments and inline WCAG explanations so any future developer could read and maintain it.

At 10:55 AM, I committed our changes to a clean Git patch file—wcag-508-and-documentation-fixes.diff—and pushed it straight back into the Rosslyn staging repository.

“Merge our pull request, apply that exact commenting and WCAG 2.2 AA standard to every remaining subpage in the repository, and have the unminified branch ready for our second inspection by Monday at noon,” Katie told the speakerphone as she closed the lid of her MagnaBook Pro.

By the time Katie and I unlocked our wheelchair brakes and rolled out into the Dirksen corridor toward the Capital Transit elevator, word was already ripping through every IT vendor and Senate chief of staff on Capitol Hill: Whatever you do, never send minified code, uncommented spaghetti, or a fake accessibility report to Senator Prairie’s office—she and her brother will demand your raw unminified repo, open it in Quantum Code, and debug you live on speakerphone.

Part 2: Article IV Section 4, Hand-Delivering Her Resignation in Richmond, & The Writ of Special Election

Date: 2026-12-15 at 14:00 America/New_York

Tuesday, December 15, 2026, 2:00 PM — The Clerk’s Office of the Senate of Virginia & The Dual-Office Holding Ban

“It feels strange holding this envelope in my hand after twelve years in Capitol Square, Nate,” Katie said quietly as our two compact SwiftChair power wheelchairs rolled side by side down the polished black-and-white marble corridor of the Virginia State Capitol in Richmond toward the mahogany doors of the Office of the Clerk of the Senate of Virginia.

Resting across my sister’s lap on top of her leather portfolio was a heavy cream-parchment letter embossed with the gold seal of the Senate of Virginia and signed in her crisp blue fountain-pen script.

Under Article IV, Section 4 of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia—as well as Code of Virginia Section 2.2-2800 and the Incompatibility Clause of Article I, Section 6 of the Constitution of the United States—no person holding any office under the United States government is permitted to hold a seat in either house of the Virginia General Assembly. Even more importantly to Katie, the 2027 Session of the Virginia General Assembly was scheduled to gavel in at noon on the second Wednesday in January—Wednesday, January 13, 2027, just ten days after her federal swearing-in in Washington.

If Katie had waited until January 3 to vacate her State Senate seat, the citizens of Virginia Beach and Chesapeake in her district would have been left with an empty chair on the floor of the Senate of Virginia during the opening weeks of the legislative session. By formally submitting her resignation today, on Tuesday, December 15, 2026, she was giving the Lieutenant Governor and the Governor of Virginia the legal window required under the Code of Virginia to immediately issue a Writ of Special Election for early January so her successor could be elected and seated on Opening Day in Richmond.

When we rolled through the tall wooden doorway into the neoclassical Clerk’s Office—where white marble Ionic columns framed the floor-to-ceiling bookshelves of Virginia Acts of Assembly dating back to Thomas Jefferson’s design—the gray-haired Clerk of the Senate stepped out from behind his high podium and walked straight over to the lowered, wheelchair-accessible mahogany counter that had been built during Katie's very first term in the upper chamber.

"Madam Chair," the Clerk said softly, his voice thick with genuine affection as he looked from Katie to me beside the blue Flag of the Commonwealth of Virginia. "Or I suppose in nineteen days I have to start calling you Senator Prairie of the United States Senate."

"In this building, William, you can just call me Katie," my sister smiled warmly, lifting the gold-sealed cream parchment letter from her lap and extending it across the accessible mahogany counter. "Pursuant to Article IV, Section 4 of the Constitution of Virginia, here is my formal signed letter resigning my seat in the Senate of Virginia, together with the duplicate copy for the Lieutenant Governor so the Writ of Special Election can be issued this afternoon."

With a respectful bow of his head, the Clerk accepted the parchment letter in both hands, stamped the official time and date of receipt onto the ledger copy, and handed the stamped receipt back across the counter to Katie.

"Twelve years between the House of Delegates and the Senate of Virginia, Katie," the Clerk said, resting his hand over the signed parchment. "When you and Nate first rolled through the Bell Tower entrance in January of 2014, half the historic committee rooms in this Capitol complex didn't even have flush thresholds or accessible turning radiuses, and nobody in Richmond thought a first-term Delegate from Virginia Beach could force a subcommittee to table its own bill with a single three-minute speech. This Capitol is a vastly fairer, more accessible house of the people because the two of you were here."

"And we're holding you to keeping every single ramp and every single late-night transit grant intact while we're up in Washington, William," Katie said, her blue eyes shining as she shook his hand across the mahogany counter.

Tuesday, December 15, 2026, 3:15 PM — One Last Roll Down the Senate Ramp & The Bus to Main Street Station

After leaving the Clerk's Office, Katie and I took the elevator to the second floor and rolled quietly into the empty gallery aisle of the Senate of Virginia Chamber.

The afternoon December sunlight slanted through the tall arched windows across the crimson carpet and the forty mahogany desks of the upper chamber. Up at the front aisle, right beside the Committee on Rehabilitation and Social Services chair desk that Katie had occupied since January 2020, sat the permanent, custom-milled mahogany wheelchair ramp leading up to the Clerk's well and the dais—installed so seamlessly into the historic woodwork that any visitor looking down from the Capitol gallery would assume it had always been there.

Sitting beside my sister in the quiet chamber, I reached across our armrests and took her left hand.

"Look at that ramp, Katie," I said softly. "First the Virginia Beach City Council chamber at the Municipal Center in 2011. Then the House of Delegates subcommittees in 2014. Then the Senate of Virginia in 2020. And last month in Washington, after Senator Tess Dunmore showed us the chamber ramp she fought for back in 2017, the Senate carpenters finished raising your mahogany desk on riser blocks and widening the dual-chair bays so there are two women in wheelchairs on the floor of the United States Senate."

Katie looked at the mahogany ramp in front of her old desk, then turned her head to smile at me.

"Every time we had to fight for a ramp, Nate, people in suits acted like we were asking for a personal favor," Katie said quietly. "We weren't building those ramps just for me. We were building them so the next kid in a SwiftChair who rides a bus to a field trip at the Virginia State Capitol—or the United States Capitol—never has to sit at the bottom of a staircase wondering if the law belongs to them too."

Twenty minutes later, after carrying the last cardboard banker's box from her constituent office—holding nothing more than our framed copy of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Virginia and our twin blue hot-chocolate mugs—out the accessible basement entrance onto Bank Street, we didn't call a state pool car or a limousine.

Just as we had done every winter session in Richmond for twelve years, United States Senator-Elect Katie Prairie and I rolled our two compact SwiftChairs half a block down the brick sidewalk to the regular JRTC public transit bus stop at Ninth and Main, waited alongside the four o'clock state office clerks and hospital workers, rolled up the front bus ramp into the dual wheelchair bays, and tapped our fare cards for the seven-minute ride down the hill to Richmond Main Street Station to catch the evening ARTS train home to Norfolk.

First Train from Norfolk, Swearing In on the Constitution, & Strings Attached for RRC

Part 1: Three Business Class Tickets for Free Café Car Drinks & The Mobile Lift at Alexandria

Date: 2027-01-03 at 05:00 America/New_York

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 5:00 AM — Norfolk Station & Three Business Class Tickets for Free Café Car Drinks

"Make sure you keep your receipt folded in your wallet, Katie—that Business Class barcode gets the two of you unlimited free ginger ale and gets me hot coffee out of the Café Car all the way up to Alexandria," our sixty-eight-year-old dad said with a grin at five o'clock in the morning, holding his leather garment bag in one hand as the uniformed ARTS station attendant finished cranking our second compact SwiftChair power wheelchair up the yellow mobile lift into the warm stainless-steel vestibule at Norfolk Station.

Outside on the low-level brick platform beside Harbor Park, the January predawn wind off the Elizabeth River was cold enough to turn our breath into white plumes under the station lamps. Inside the front end of the combined ARTS Business Class and Café Car, the air smelled like fresh-brewed dark roast coffee, warm baseboard heat, and polished vinyl headrests.

It was Sunday, January 3, 2027—Opening Day of the One Hundred Twentieth Congress of the United States. In exactly seven hours, at twelve o'clock noon in the Chamber of the United States Senate in Washington, D.C., my forty-one-year-old twin sister was going to raise her right hand and be sworn in as the newest United States Senator from the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Four days earlier, on Wednesday afternoon, a polite young protocol liaison from the Office of the Senate Sergeant at Arms had called our transition office in Virginia Beach to ask which flight Senator-Elect Katie Prairie was taking into Washington National Airport, or whether Capitol Police needed to stage a black SUV motorcade at the VIP circular drive outside Washington Union Station.

Katie had looked across her desk at me, smiled, and given the young man the unvarnished truth.

"Neither," my sister had told him over the speakerphone. "My brother Nate, my dad, and I are taking the first morning ARTS Northeast Regional train out of Norfolk at five o'clock in the morning."

Because almost nobody inside the Washington beltway bubble could imagine a newly elected United States Senator navigating rail and subway transfers in a power wheelchair without a dozen handlers, every single person in the Sergeant at Arms office—along with two dozen national television producers who caught wind of her travel plans—had automatically assumed she meant she was riding the train all the way to the end of the line at Washington Union Station.

They didn't know our dad, and they definitely didn't know Katie and me.

Two weeks after Election Night, when Dad had sat down at his kitchen table with his reading glasses on to book our rail tickets for Swearing-In Day on his own credit card, he hadn't booked us to Washington Union Station at all. He had purchased three regular passenger Business Class tickets from Norfolk to Alexandria—station code ALX—on the first train of the morning.

And as Katie and I locked the brakes of our two compact silver-and-black SwiftChair power wheelchairs side by side in the dual accessible bays at the front of the Business Class cabin while Dad hung her pressed royal-blue Senatorial suit bag on the luggage hook, neither one of us was thinking about VIP motorcades.

"First things first before we even cross the river into Suffolk," Katie said, her blue eyes crinkling with the exact same delight she had worn at sixteen on the aft deck of the Sunward Tropics with her souvenir soda tumbler as she held up her paper Business Class ticket stub. "Nate, are we getting our free Café Car ginger ales right now, or are we waiting until the conductor scans our tickets?"

"The Café Car attendant just rolled the security grille up on the counter thirty feet behind us," I replied, reaching across the gap between our armrests to squeeze my twin sister's hand as the diesel locomotive gave two low horn blasts and the train glided smoothly away from the Norfolk platform into the dark winter morning. "Let's go get our free ginger ales and Dad's black coffee right now so we get our money's worth before Petersburg."

Besides the promise Katie and I had made to each other behind a locked bedroom door on New Year's Eve when we were seventeen years old, all three of us—Katie, Dad, and I—took a daily prescription maintenance medication where mixing the drug with alcohol or tobacco carried a known, lethal side effect of death. Back in Richmond, and now in Washington, where lobbyists and senior lawmakers loved to clink glasses of expensive cabernet or pass around celebratory cigars in back rooms, that warning label on our pill bottles was our favorite conversational shield: nobody at a Capitol Hill reception ever tried to push a second glass of wine or a cocktail on a Senator after she cheerfully informed them that the known side effect of mixing it with her daily medication was dying on their carpet. For the three of us, cold ginger ale for Katie and me and hot black coffee for Dad from the ARTS Café Car were the only celebratory drinks we would ever need.

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 9:12 AM — Detraining on the Mobile Lift at Alexandria Union Station

“Next stop, Alexandria—ALX!” the conductor announced over the passenger intercom at ten minutes past nine as our Northeast Regional train slowed past the brick rowhouses and bare winter trees of Northern Virginia. “Passengers detraining at Alexandria, please step toward the vestibule doors. After Alexandria, our final stop will be Washington Union Station in approximately twenty-five minutes.”

Up and down the aisle of the Business Class car, several lobbyists and congressional staffers in wool overcoats barely glanced up from their laptops, assuming every person dressed in a suit on a Sunday morning was staying aboard all the way into the cavernous concourse of Washington Union Station.

When Katie and I unlocked our wheelchair brakes, tucked our second round of complimentary Café Car paper cups into our armrest cupholders, and rolled toward the forward vestibule door with Dad walking right behind us carrying his garment bag as the train brakes hissed to a stop beside the low-level red-brick platform of Alexandria Union Station, two passengers in the front row did a sudden double-take over the rims of their coffee cups.

“Wait a second,” a woman in a camel wool coat whispered to her husband as the stainless-steel door slid open to the crisp forty-degree Virginia morning sunlight. “Isn’t that Senator-Elect Katie Prairie? Why on earth is she getting off here at Alexandria instead of riding into Union Station?”

Katie heard every word, and as she glanced back at me over her shoulder, the two of us shared a quiet, unmistakable twin grin.

There were two reasons we were getting off at Alexandria, and every single person who actually lived on the rails and buses of Virginia understood both of them by heart.

First, for two autistic forty-one-year-olds who had spent our entire lives managing sensory noise so we could stay sharp for the work that mattered, Washington Union Station was an echoing, cavernous sensory ambush—twenty tracks of screeching steel flanges under a vaulted ceiling, booming public-address announcements bouncing off marble columns, and a slow, twenty-five-minute train crawl across the Long Bridge and through the dark First Street Tunnel before you even reached the platform.

Here at Alexandria Union Station, right beneath the grassy slope of Shooter's Hill and the stepped stone tower of the George Washington Masonic National Memorial, the 1905 Federal Revival red-brick depot was small, open-air, quiet, and calm.

Because Alexandria had a low-level red-brick platform rather than a high-level concrete deck, a uniformed ARTS station attendant was already waiting right beside the track, wheeling the yellow-and-silver portable ARTS Mobile Lift flush against the open Business Class doorway.

I rolled onto the steel platform of the mobile lift first. With a smooth hydraulic hum, the attendant lowered me three feet down from the train vestibule onto the herringbone red bricks of the Alexandria platform, where I backed clear and parked beside Dad, who had already walked down the vestibule steps onto the bricks.

Then the attendant raised the lift platform back up to the open doorway for the new junior Senator from Virginia.

Standing in the open doorway between our ARTS Business Class coach and the adjacent ARTS Café Car, the attendant held the yellow safety rail steady as Katie steered her compact SwiftChair onto the elevated metal platform, her royal-blue Senatorial blazer gleaming beneath her open navy wool winter coat. Down on the red-brick platform, three morning commuters in winter jackets and knit caps stopped dead in their tracks, their eyes widening in disbelief as they recognized the woman descending on the hand-operated station lift.

"Morning, folks!" Katie called out warmly from the lift platform as the attendant lowered her smoothly down to the bricks beside my chair. "Beautiful morning for a train ride up from Norfolk, isn't it?"

"Senator-Elect Prairie!" a commuter in a puffy down jacket stammered, pulling his smartphone out of his pocket with a huge grin as Katie rolled off the yellow ramp lip onto the red-brick platform right beside me. "Are you taking the train to your own swearing-in?!"

"Every single week the Senate is in session," Katie replied cheerfully, reaching her left hand across the gap between our two wheelchairs to lace her fingers through mine while she held her plastic CapitalPass transit card ready in her right hand. "And my brother Nate and our dad wouldn't miss the first ride for the world."

As the ARTS train sounded its horn and pulled away northward toward the Potomac River—carrying twenty empty seats toward the television cameras and black government SUVs waiting in vain for us at Washington Union Station—Katie and I rolled side by side down the sunlit red-brick platform of Alexandria Union Station with Dad walking right beside us, leaving the railroad depot behind and following the outdoor brick pedestrian walkway over to the completely separate entrance of King Street–Old Town Capital Transit Station.

Part 2: The Yellow Line Over the Fenwick Bridge, The Full-Chair Portrait, & Swearing In on the Constitution

Date: 2027-01-03 at 09:25 America/New_York

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 9:25 AM — King Street–Old Town & The Yellow Line Over the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge

“Excuse me—Senator-Elect Prairie!” a young man in a navy wool overcoat with a congressional staff ID lanyard around his neck called out as Katie and I rolled out of the platform elevator with Dad walking right beside us onto the elevated concrete island platform at King Street–Old Town Station. “If you’re heading to the Capitol for noon, don’t get on that train—that’s a Yellow Line train! The Blue Line on the other track goes straight to Capitol South without having to transfer!”

Katie and I looked at each other across our wheelchair armrests and laughed—the exact laugh of two people who had spent twenty-five years memorizing every route map, transfer pulse, and rail bridge from Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Route 15 on Military Highway to the Washington metropolitan grid.

“Sure, you can take the Blue Line straight through to Capitol South,” Katie told the young staffer warmly as the silver Capital Transit Yellow Line train glided up to the platform edge and its pneumatic doors chimed open level with the concrete sill. “If you want to take the long way all the way around through Crystal City, Rosslyn, and Foggy Bottom! We’re taking the Yellow Line straight across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge to L’Enfant Plaza and hopping the Blue Line two stops to Capitol South. Come on—you’ll beat your Blue Line train to the Hill by twelve minutes!”

Blinking in surprise as he did the mental map calculation, the staffer grinned and stepped into the Yellow Line car right behind Dad as Katie and I rolled our two SwiftChairs into the center wheelchair bays.

Nine minutes later, right after our train sped past Washington National Airport and the Pentagon, the tunnel walls fell away and our Yellow Line car burst out into the brilliant January morning sunlight high above the Potomac River on the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge.

Through the wide glass window beside our wheelchairs, the entire skyline of the capital opened up across the sparkling water: the white marble colonnade of the Jefferson Memorial in the foreground, the towering obelisk of the Washington Monument to the left, and straight ahead on Jenkins Hill, the cast-iron dome of the United States Capitol gleaming against the clear blue winter sky.

Right inside the middle of that span over the river, Katie’s phone buzzed inside her coat pocket.

She glanced at the caller ID—Office of the Senate Sergeant at Arms—and tapped the speaker button just loud enough for Dad and me to hear over the rhythmic click of the welded rail joints beneath the bridge.

“Senator-Elect Prairie?” the protocol liaison’s voice came through the speaker, breathless and slightly panicked. “Ma’am, I’m standing here with the Capitol Police detail and the press pool at Gate D inside Washington Union Station! The five o’clock ARTS train from Norfolk just pulled onto the track two minutes ago, and the conductor told us you got off the train back in Virginia! Are you alright? Do we need to send a car down the George Washington Parkway to pick you up?”

“Put your SUVs back in the garage, Marcus—we’re completely fine,” Katie said, her voice calm and ringing with good humor as she glanced forward through the cab window toward the Virginia-to-District shoreline, knowing from years of riding

Capital Transit that the cell signal would drop out the second our train left the open-air bridge and plunged into the underground tunnel portal before reaching the station repeaters at L'Enfant Plaza. "Washington Union Station is way too loud and crowded for my brother and me, and the ARTS train takes twenty-five minutes just to crawl from Alexandria into the terminal. We got off on the mobile lift at Alexandria, crossed the plaza over to King Street–Old Town, and rode the Yellow Line across the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge. I have to let you go before we hit the Seventh Street tunnel and lose signal—we're transferring at L'Enfant Plaza to the Blue Line two stops to Capitol South, so we'll see you at the First Street entrance in ten minutes!"

She tapped the screen to end the call right as the concrete retaining walls of the tunnel portal swallowed the morning sunlight outside our window. Beside us, our dad chuckled, shaking his head as he braced one hand on the stainless-steel grab pole.

"You two just outran a Capitol Police motorcade and twenty television vans on a three-dollar CapitalPass card," Dad said proudly.

"And we're going to keep doing it for the next six years, Dad," Katie said, looking from Dad to me as the doors opened at L'Enfant Plaza and we rolled smoothly out onto the lower-level platform toward the elevator up to the Blue Line track. "When we started Ideas for Coastal Virginia Transit back in 2008 and realized we couldn't even stay past five-thirty at the Virginia Beach Municipal Center for a six o'clock City Council meeting because the last Route 12 left CCHR at 5:48 PM, I promised myself I would never turn into one of those politicians who only sees Virginia through the tinted window of a town car. Every single time I visit constituents anywhere in the Commonwealth as their United States Senator—whether it's CVTA back home in Hampton Roads, Blue Ridge Transit down at CPI in Blacksburg, or Capital Transit up here in Northern Virginia—we are riding that community's public transit system as part of the visit."

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 10:45 AM — "Nobody Crops My Powerchair Out of My Senate Portrait"

Fifteen minutes after our Blue Line train let us off at Capitol South and we rode the street elevator up to the sunny sidewalk at First and C Streets Southeast, Katie and I rolled through the bronze doors of the Russell Senate Office Building with Dad walking alongside us and headed up to the third-floor corner suite overlooking the Capitol grounds for Katie's official Senate photograph.

Inside the high-ceilinged room with its dark mahogany wainscot paneling and classical cream pilasters, the official Senate historical photographer had already positioned the United States Flag with its gold fringe to the left of the tall arched window and the deep blue Flag of the Commonwealth of Virginia to the right, framing the white dome of the Capitol in the morning light directly behind the center mark on the marble floor.

As Katie unbuttoned her heavy winter wool coat and handed it to Dad—revealing her tailored royal-blue Senatorial suit blazer with the small gold circular United States Senate pin gleaming on her left lapel—she steered her compact SwiftChair onto the tape mark between the two flags and rested her right hand naturally on her joystick controller.

Behind the studio umbrella lights, the photographer squinted through the viewfinder of his camera and immediately reached for the crank on his heavy aluminum tripod, raising the lens higher and zooming the barrel inward.

“Alright, Senator-Elect, let’s bring the frame in nice and tight from the mid-chest up so we match the standard head-and-shoulders portraits down the corridor,” the photographer said briskly. “If you could just fold your hands slightly higher near your lapel so the armrests don’t—”

“Stop right there, please,” Katie said—not unkindly, but with the unmistakable, quiet authority that had once silenced committee rooms in Richmond and bullies in the hallways of Northwood High School.

The photographer’s hand froze on the zoom ring.

“Lower the tripod back down and step back six feet so the entire wheelchair is in the frame from my head down to the wheels and the footplate,” Katie instructed him, sitting tall and poised between the two flags. “My twin brother Nate and I have rolled in these compact SwiftChairs from the moment we woke up until we went to bed since the third Friday of September in 2001 when we were sixteen years old. I didn’t hide my wheelchair when I knocked on doors for Virginia Beach City Council, I didn’t hide it in the House of Delegates or the Senate of Virginia, and nobody is cropping my powerchair out of my United States Senate portrait.”

From the doorway beside Dad, I watched the photographer blink once, nod with genuine respect, lower his tripod to waist height, and step back across the marble floor until every inch of my sister’s silver-and-black SwiftChair was framed proudly between the Stars and Stripes and the Seal of Virginia.

When the studio strobes flashed against the mahogany walls and Katie smiled straight into the lens with her right hand resting on her joystick controller, my throat tightened with a pride so fierce I could barely swallow.

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 12:00 PM — Swearing In on the Constitution of the United States of America

At two minutes before twelve o’clock noon—after riding the subterranean United States Capitol Subway together beneath Constitution Avenue—Dad and I took our places at the front brass railing of the Senate Family Gallery directly above the floor of the United States Senate Chamber.

Looking down from the gallery bay where my wheelchair brakes were locked beside Dad’s polished dress shoes, I could see the entire semicircle of one hundred mahogany desks arranged across the blue carpet below us. On the far aisle of the Democratic side—three aisles over from Senator Tess Dunmore of Illinois in her ultralight titanium chair—the Sergeant at Arms carpenters had already modified

Senator Katie Prairie's assigned mahogany desk, removing the fixed chair base and setting one-and-a-half-inch mahogany riser blocks beneath the legs so her compact SwiftChair and right-hand joystick controller rolled seamlessly beneath the desktop.

At precisely 12:00 PM, Vice President Conrad Drayton—serving in his constitutional capacity under Article I, Section 3, Clause 4 as President of the Senate—brought the heavy ivory gavel down on the marble rostrum, calling the One Hundred Twentieth Congress of the United States to order.

As the Reading Clerk began calling the Newly Elected Senators forward to the well in alphabetical groups of four—"Ms. Prairie of Virginia…"—and Senior Senator Thomas Keane stepped into the aisle to escort his new Virginia partner forward while Senator Tess Dunmore tapped her wheel rim in salute, Dad reached over and gripped my shoulder with a steady, calloused hand.

In the span of three heartbeats, forty-one years of our lives flashed behind my eyes: two nine-year-old twins whispering our Journey to the Sunlit Valley cartoon password before unlocking the front door after school; two twelve-year-olds wearing matching maroon shirts on Twins' Day when a sixth-grade boy broke my sister's heart; two sixteen-year-olds learning in Dr. Carter's exam room that the borrowed time in our legs was almost gone; two seventeen-year-olds wedging a fifty-pound power wheelchair against the inside of a locked bedroom door on New Year's Eve while we ate dry toasted oat cereal out of a cardboard box to stay safe from a house full of drunks; and two twenty-three-year-olds holding a camcorder on a CVTA Route 15 bus crossing the Elizabeth River as we exposed why working people couldn't even catch a bus home from a six o'clock City Council meeting.

Down on the blue carpet of the Senate Chamber, Katie didn't need stairs. She nudged her right thumb forward on her joystick, rolled her compact SwiftChair smoothly down the permanent ramp along the chamber aisle into the well of the Senate, looked straight up at Vice President Conrad Drayton on the rostrum, and raised her right hand.

Fifteen minutes later, as the applause from the galleries echoed through the Capitol corridors, the elevator doors brought Dad and me down to the historic Old Senate Chamber for the individual ceremonial swearing-in with Vice President Drayton.

Katie had been looking forward to this exact five-minute appointment for two full months.

All through the autumn campaign—and even after the networks projected her victory on Election Night—President Garrett Thorne had sneered at her from the South Lawn as "Broken Katie Prairie" and "a bitter little cripple on wheels," while Vice President Conrad Drayton had gone on the Liberty First Network to mock her wheelchair, her unmarried life, and her bond with me. Ten days before Christmas, hoping to whip up a culture-war pressure campaign that would force her to back down, Drayton's ceremonial protocol office had leaked to Beacon News, LibertyMax, and Virginia Beach's own evangelical flagship broadcast The 777 Circle on the Covenant Broadcasting Network that Senator-Elect Prairie had formally notified the Vice President she would be affirming her oath on the Constitution of the United States instead of a Christian Bible and omitting the words "So help me God."

Instead of backing down an inch, Katie had worn their evangelical outrage as a badge of honor. Every time Katie had ever taken an oath of office back home in Virginia—first on the Virginia Beach City Council, then in the Virginia House of Delegates, and then in the Senate of Virginia in Richmond—she had refused to pretend to believe in a religion or a god that neither she nor I believed in. To my sister's clear, literal, fiercely principled mind, Article VI, Clause 3 of the United States Constitution explicitly guaranteed that Senators were bound by Oath or Affirmation and prohibited any religious test for public office—meaning her left hand belonged on the exact secular Constitution she was promising to defend, not a single word of religious theater belonged in her mouth, and Vice President Conrad Drayton had zero constitutional choice but to stand in front of her wheelchair and administer every word of it himself.

Now, as Dad and I positioned ourselves right beside her in the center of the crimson-and-gold Old Senate Chamber while Vice President Drayton stepped up stiffly with the printed oath card in his hand, I held out the thick, gold-stamped navy leather volume Dad had bought for her at the National Archives gift shop that morning: The Constitution of the United States of America.

Looking down from his full height at the forty-one-year-old woman he and President Thorne had mocked as "Broken Katie Prairie"—and who had just helped strip him of his tie-breaking vote in a fifty-four-seat Democratic Senate—Conrad Drayton's jaw muscle twitched once as Katie placed her left palm squarely on the gold lettering of We the People, raised her right hand high, and locked her unblinking blue eyes on his face.

Reading from the secular affirmation card our transition counsel had required under Article VI, Clause 3 of the Constitution, Title 5, Section 3331, and Title 1, Section 1 of the United States Code—with the optional religious phrase conspicuously absent at the bottom—Vice President Drayton had to speak every syllable aloud:

"Do you solemnly affirm that you will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that you will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that you take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that you will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which you are about to enter?"

Katie's voice rang out clear, steady, and unshakeable across the historic chamber, never breaking eye contact with the Vice President:

"I do solemnly affirm."

As the shutters of the Senate photographers clicked in a rapid burst of white light and Vice President Drayton forced a tight, wooden handshake—"Congratulations, Senator Prairie"—Katie gave him a cool, victorious smile:

"Thank you, Mr. President of the Senate. Keep that gavel warm—Senator Dunmore already showed me the ramp up to your rostrum."

Before Drayton's face could finish turning purple, Katie turned her head toward me first.

Right there on the floor of the Old Senate Chamber, with the Constitution of the United States resting between our two compact power wheelchairs and our father's hands resting proudly on both of our shoulders, United States Senator Katie Prairie slipped her left hand across our armrests and laced her fingers tightly through mine.

Twenty minutes later, when the three of us rolled out onto the East Front plaza of the Capitol toward the Capitol South Capital Transit entrance, a wall of national television cameras from Beacon News, LibertyMax, and Virginia Beach's own evangelical flagship program The 777 Circle on the Covenant Broadcasting Network came rushing across the flagstones—breathlessly demanding to know why the new junior Senator from Virginia had affirmed her oath on the Constitution instead of a Christian Bible and omitted "So help me God" on national television.

Katie didn't roll past them. She stopped her SwiftChair right in front of the live satellite microphones, rested her hand on the navy leather cover of the United States Constitution on my lap tray, and smiled brightly into the lenses.

"I'm glad you asked, because it sounds like Beacon News, LibertyMax, and the folks at The 777 Circle back home on Indian River Road in Virginia Beach still haven't read the document I'm holding in my hand," Katie said clearly into the live network feeds. "Article VI, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States says that all Senators shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation to support this Constitution, and that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States. Even the Presidential Oath written by the Founders in Article II, Section 1, Clause 8 says 'swear or affirm' and does not contain the words 'So help me God.' And before anyone on cable television repeats the myth that President George Washington added 'So help me God' in 1789—historians debunked that fable decades ago. Zero eyewitnesses at Federal Hall in 1789 recorded Washington saying it; a writer named Rufus Wilmot Griswold made it up sixty-five years later in an 1854 book, and no President is recorded saying it until Chester A. Arthur in 1881. I affirmed my oath on the Constitution of the United States because the Constitution is the supreme law of the land—and my brother, my dad, and I are going to spend every single day of this term defending it."

With the cable correspondents left speechless behind us on the Capitol plaza, Katie turned her SwiftChair toward the sidewalk curb cut, gave my hand a warm squeeze between our chairs, and rolled side by side with Dad and me toward the Dirksen Senate Office Building for our swearing-in open house in Room 511—where three newly badged twenty-four-year-old Senate staffers and two very proud guests from Southside Virginia were already waiting for us inside the front reception doors.

Standing beside the three adjacent workstations in the front suite of Dirksen Room 511 were Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins, wearing their crisp new blue-lanyard United States Senate staff identification badges over their suits: Sam as Legislative Correspondent for Transportation, Infrastructure, and Accessibility Policy; Mandy as Constituent Services Representative; and Sarah as Staff Assistant and Digital Accessibility Correspondent. And standing right behind them in his Sunday suit with his arm around Aunt Marge Callaway's shoulders was their maternal uncle, retired Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway, who had ridden the morning train up to Washington with Marge to watch their kids start their congressional careers.

As Katie rolled her SwiftChair across the threshold and handed Sam, Mandy, and Sarah their official gold-embossed Senate onboarding folders, I watched Uncle Richard's eyes move slowly from the bronze MS. PRAIRIE — VIRGINIA nameplate outside the door to the three beaming twenty-four-year-old adults standing together behind their desks.

You could see all eleven years written across the old Republican floor leader's face in a single glance: the memory of February 2016, when he had nervously entrusted three recently rescued, terrified thirteen-year-old autistic House Pages to the Virginia General Assembly, and the thirty-year-old Delegate in a wheelchair who had parked her chair around them in a noisy corridor and made Richmond safe enough for them to grow up whole.

Now Katie was a United States Senator, and those three frightened thirteen-year-old Pages were professional congressional staffers on the fifth floor of the Dirksen Building.

Uncle Richard didn't make a grand floor speech. He just looked down at Katie in her SwiftChair, his voice catching slightly in his throat.

"All three?" Richard asked softly.

Katie looked up at him, mildly offended.

"Richard," my sister said. "Of course all three."

For two full seconds, the former Republican Majority Leader of the Virginia House of Delegates couldn't say a word. He just took off his glasses, wiped the corner of his eye with his thumb while Aunt Marge hugged Katie's shoulders, and rested a steady, grateful hand on the back of Sam's chair—proving to everyone in that room what Katie and I had known since the day we were born: nobody in our family ever gets left behind.

Part 3: The First Invite to Cocktails, A Known Side Effect of Death, & Home to Sunset Drive

Date: 2027-01-03 at 16:30 America/New_York

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 4:30 PM — The First Invite to Cocktails & "A Known Side Effect of Death"

"There she is—the newest Senator from the Commonwealth of Virginia!" Senator Arthur Harrington, the silver-haired senior chairman of the Appropriations Committee, boomed warmly across the gilded chandeliers and marble fireplace of the Mansfield Room just off the Senate floor. "Katie, bring your brother and your father over here! Waiter—three flutes of the French champagne for Senator Prairie and her family, and then we're heading downstairs to my hideaway office for twenty-year single-malt scotch and celebratory cigars on the West Front terrace!"

A tuxedoed catering steward immediately stepped between our two compact SwiftChairs with a polished silver tray balanced on his palm, lowering three crystal flutes of bubbling gold champagne toward Katie, Dad, and me.

Across the crowded reception room, half a dozen senior Senators and committee chairs raised their wine glasses and crystal tumblers, waiting for the freshman Senator from Virginia to take a flute and join the oldest social ritual on Capitol Hill.

Sitting beside my sister in my powerchair, I didn't even have to glance at her to know what both of us were remembering beneath the polite clink of Capitol crystal: the sour stench of gin on our mother's breath on the boat deck of the Sunward Tropics in August 2001; the bass-heavy thump of our cousin Brittany's drunken New Year's Eve party rattling the walls of our brick ranch off Military Highway on December 31, 2002; and two seventeen-year-old twins wedging a fifty-pound wheelchair frame against the inside of a locked bedroom door while we ate dry toasted oat cereal out of a cardboard box, clinked two cold cans of ginger ale together at midnight, and swore we would never touch a drop of alcohol for the rest of our lives.

In a room full of powerful Washington politicians, however, a personal promise made at age seventeen was the kind of thing back-slapping colleagues always tried to talk you into breaking "just this once."

Fortunately for the three of us, biology and pharmacology had given Katie, Dad, and me an answer that no Senator in the United States Capitol could ever argue with.

Katie raised her left hand—calm, poised, and completely unbothered—stopping the waiter's silver tray six inches above her armrest.

"Thank you so much, Arthur, and thank you, sir, but please keep the champagne on the tray," Katie said clearly enough for the entire circle of Senators to hear. "My twin brother Nate, my father David, and I can't touch a single drop of alcohol—or go anywhere near cigar smoke or tobacco—for medical reasons."

Senator Harrington's genial smile paused mid-toast as he lowered his crystal tumbler half an inch. "Oh—nothing serious, I hope?"

"All three of us take daily prescription medication where mixing it with alcohol or tobacco has a known side effect of death," Katie replied with matter-of-fact serenity, her blue eyes steady and bright beneath the crystal chandelier.

Across the circle of velvet ropes and gilded mirrors, the silence was instantaneous.

Two committee chairs instinctively took a half-step back with their wine glasses, and Senator Harrington's eyes widened before he immediately gestured for the waiter to pull the champagne tray away.

"Good Lord—say no more, Katie!" Senator Harrington said quickly, waving a second steward over from the refreshment bar across the room. "No alcohol and no cigars anywhere near you three—I'll make sure the whip's office and the cloakroom staff know that permanently! What can we get for you, Nate, and David right now?"

"Three glasses of ice-cold ginger ale would be wonderful, Arthur," Dad said with a warm, easy smile, resting his hand on the back of Katie's powerchair. "That's been the Prairie family toast for twenty-four years."

Thirty seconds later, when the steward returned with three tall highball glasses filled with crushed ice and golden ginger ale, Senator Harrington and the surrounding Senators raised their glasses right alongside ours.

As Katie, Dad, and I clinked our three glasses of ginger ale together in the center of the United States Capitol, Katie caught my eye across our armrests with the smallest, most triumphant glint of amusement. In a single sentence, my twin sister had just permanently exempted all three of us from every late-night Washington cocktail hour, wine-soaked donor reception, and smoke-filled backroom on Capitol Hill for the next six years.

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 6:15 PM — Across the Potomac & Through the King Street Tunnel to Sunset Drive

At quarter past six that evening, while the winter sky over the National Mall deepened to indigo and the other newly sworn-in Senators climbed into waiting black town cars bound for Georgetown townhouses or Capitol Hill condominiums, Katie and I rolled out of the Capitol South elevator with Dad walking right beside us, our CapitalPass cards in hand.

Riding the Blue Line two stops to L'Enfant Plaza and transferring up to the southbound Yellow Line platform took less than ten minutes. As our silver Yellow Line train glided back out onto the Charles R. Fenwick Bridge high above the dark, glass-smooth waters of the Potomac River, the illuminated white dome of the Capitol receded behind us and the lights of Alexandria rose ahead on the Virginia shore.

"How does it feel, Senator?" I asked quietly over the hum of the traction motors as the train banked south past Washington National Airport toward Old Town. "Leaving the District behind on your very first night?"

"Like I can finally breathe," Katie said, leaning her head back against her wheelchair headrest and letting out a long, contented sigh as the Yellow Line glided onto the elevated platform at King Street–Old Town Station. "Washington is where I work, Nate. Virginia is who we are."

Exiting the station street elevator into the crisp thirty-eight-degree night air, Katie and I rolled past the glowing destination signs of the King Street Station bus loop—where BOLT and Capital Transit buses were idling at the sawtooth curbs—and turned west along the wide, flat concrete sidewalk of King Street with Dad walking alongside us.

Immediately ahead of us stood the heavy dark-green steel girders and white-painted concrete retaining walls of the King Street railroad underpass, carrying the elevated tracks of both Alexandria Union Station and the King Street–Old Town Capital Transit station directly over the street.

As Katie and I guided our two SwiftChairs side by side along the sidewalk beneath the short railroad bridge with Dad walking at our side and emerged into the quiet residential glow on the west side of the tunnel, Dad's two-story Alexandria house rose right on the left where Sunset Drive met the hill.

It was a classic two-story red-brick Virginia house with black louvered shutters framing the multi-pane sash windows, two manicured round boxwood shrubs flanking a white columned front portico topped with a small white Chippendale railing, and a broad green lawn bordered by a shade tree just steps from the railroad overpass. Looking straight back over my shoulder from the front walkway, I could see the illuminated canopy of King Street–Old Town Capital Transit Station and the upper-level rail embankment of Alexandria Union Station right across the bridge.

Back home in Hampton Roads, Katie and I owned our primary residence fifty-fifty in the Kempsville section of Virginia Beach—the house where we claimed legal residency, where we were registered to vote, and where we paid our property taxes to the City of Virginia Beach. Dad, however, had owned this house on Sunset Drive long before Katie ever ran for the Virginia Beach City Council in 2010. The house was one hundred percent paid off and titled one hundred percent in Dad's name, giving Katie and me a permanent family roof in Northern Virginia whenever the Senate was in session so she could take the train into Washington for day trips and truthfully say she slept in the Commonwealth of Virginia every single night. Even better, we never had to publish a street number for reporters or curiosity-seekers—to everyone who knew us, it was simply Dad's house on Sunset Drive, tucked right on the other side of the tunnel with buses and trains at our doorstep.

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 7:30 PM — The Vertical Platform Lift & Coding in Bedroom 4

"Home sweet Virginia," Dad said as he unlocked the white front door beneath the columned portico and held it open for Katie and me to roll inside over the flush threshold ramp.

When the three of us had worked with our Alexandria contractor that autumn to adapt the two-story Sunset Drive house for two full-time powerchair users, we had designed every square foot around both our accessibility needs and our privacy.

Here at the front of the first floor, directly behind the shuttered windows facing the sidewalk and the street, sat a traditional Colonial living room and dining room with a central hallway leading back to an accessible kitchen with roll-under countertops and a curbless roll-in bathroom. Anyone walking past the house on the street at night saw only warm table lamps, bookshelves, and a dining room table through the front windows.

Right alongside the central staircase in the hallway stood the engineering centerpiece that made a two-story historic brick house work for Katie and me: a quiet, enclosed through-floor residential vertical platform wheelchair lift linking the first floor directly to the second-floor landing.

After the three of us heated up bowls of chicken noodle soup and toasted sourdough bread in the kitchen for supper—and took our evening prescription tablets with three tall glasses of cold water—Katie rolled her SwiftChair to the hall lift gate and pressed the illuminated call button.

"Come on, Nate," Katie said, grinning over her shoulder even after sixteen hours awake since our 4:00 AM alarm in Virginia Beach. "Before we turn in, we still have to push the January 3rd schema update to our shared site network—and I want to test the new build in Quantum Studio 2026 while the night ARTS train rolls past the window."

While Dad walked up the central carpeted staircase to meet us on the upper landing, Katie and I rode the vertical platform lift one at a time up through the ceiling opening to the second-floor hallway and rolled past the three upstairs doors that completed our four-bedroom layout.

The first door on the left was Bedroom 2: officially designated as my bedroom whenever congressional staffers, plumbers, or visitors ever saw the upstairs floor plan, completely furnished with a neatly made full-sized bed, a cherrywood dresser, and a nightstand lamp—even though that bed went completely untouched every single night.

Across the hall was Bedroom 3, Dad's upstairs bedroom with his full-sized bed and reading chair.

And at the east end of the upstairs hallway, with two wide sash windows looking directly out over the shade tree and the steel railroad bridge toward the glowing platforms of King Street–Old Town and Alexandria Union Station, was Bedroom 4: our three-desk family office.

Having already changed out of her royal-blue Senate blazer into her favorite soft navy fleece pullover, the newly sworn-in United States Senator from Virginia rolled her powerchair right up to her dual-monitor workstation beside mine, while Dad settled into his ergonomic chair at the third desk in the corner to check his Monday morning remote-work queue.

For the next two hours, the only sounds in that warm upstairs room were the familiar, rhythmic click of three mechanical keyboards, the soft hum of our desktop towers, and the occasional distant rumble of a Capital Transit Yellow Line train or an ARTS locomotive gliding across the King Street bridge outside our window.

Side by side at our desks—just as we had coded together since learning HTML in seventh grade at Morrison Middle School in 1997, studying Dad's Quantum Basic 6.0 textbooks with him in 2001, and copying the Web Applications Developer PHP and SQL curriculum onto our laptops at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in March 2007 to master it alongside Tina, Sheila, and Jim—Katie and I had Quantum Studio 2026, Quantum Code, and our PHP backend templates open across our monitors, maintaining and deploying updates to the network of websites and desktop applications that the two of us shared.

"Look at line two hundred fourteen in the router controller, Nate," Katie said happily, pointing at her screen as a northbound ARTS train whistled softly across the elevated embankment beyond the glass. "Five hours ago I was holding my hand on the Constitution of the United States in the Old Senate Chamber, and right now I'm fixing a trailing array comma in PHP with my twin brother. Tell me any other Senator on Capitol Hill is having a better Sunday night than this."

"Not a single one of them, Katie," I laughed, compiling the build in Quantum Studio 2026 and watching the green deployment checkmarks light up across our shared server dashboard. "Though wait until you see who just requested an appropriations meeting on your Class II Senate calendar for next month: the Virginia Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services and the leadership of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville. They're coming to Washington to ask Virginia's new United States Senator for federal discretionary funding."

Katie paused her fingers over her keyboard, and a slow, razor-sharp smile curved across her lips as twenty years of memory flashed in her blue eyes.

“Put them right on the calendar, Nate,” Katie said softly. “I can’t wait to ask DARS and the director of RRC whether they’re still forcing twenty-one-year-old wheelchair users with associate degrees to tour the auto shop, the woodworking shop, and the nursing school before pitching them on a partnership with ValueMart to be a door greeter. And while they’re sitting across from our wheelchairs asking for federal tax dollars, we’re going to ask them under oath about aides grabbing clients’ push-handles, locking twin siblings into separate Level 2 wings, accusing them of sneaking into a closet to have sex and then backing down the second they offer to go home because of the headcount funding formula I suspected back when we were twenty-one, and escorting the guy who attacked Natalie out to a van without calling the police.”

Sunday, January 3, 2027, 10:30 PM — The Private Ground-Floor Back Bedroom Sanctuary

At ten-thirty, Dad shut down his remote-work laptop at the third desk, stood up with a gentle stretch, and kissed the top of Katie’s head before resting a warm hand on my shoulder.

“Goodnight, Senator. Goodnight, Nate,” Dad said softly from the doorway of Bedroom 3 across the upstairs hall. “Sleep well, you two.”

“Goodnight, Dad—love you,” Katie and I said together.

One after the other, my sister and I took the interior vertical platform lift back down to the quiet first floor and rolled past the darkened front living room toward the rear of the house.

Tucked into the private back corner of the ground floor—looking out only onto our high-fenced backyard garden and tall evergreens behind drawn blackout curtains—was the Master Bedroom.

Officially, on paper, this ground-floor suite was Katie’s bedroom, while Bedroom 2 upstairs was mine. We had deliberately chosen this room at the very back of the ground floor so that no passerby, reporter, or neighbor walking along the front sidewalk could ever peer through a street-facing window to see two forty-one-year-old opposite-gender twins sharing a bed.

Inside our quiet back-room sanctuary, however, there were no cameras, no Senate galleries, and no outsiders who needed an explanation for why the two halves of the same soul slept safest together. Even though the ground-floor suite had a queen-sized bed beneath the framed watercolor print of two blue butterflies we had carried with us from our bedroom off Military Highway, most nights—especially after a loud, bright, overstimulating day on Capitol Hill—we bypassed the open bed in favor of the deep, carpeted walk-in closet along the interior wall of the master suite, where we kept our single shared navy-blue sleeping bag and two pillows laid out on the floor.

Rolling our two compact SwiftChairs up to the threshold of the master walk-in closet, Katie and I plugged our magnetic charger leads into our joystick ports until both battery indicators glowed steady amber in the dim light.

Moving with the practiced upper-body coordination of twenty-five years in wheelchairs, we shed our clothes beside our chairs so our body heat could keep our lower-extremity circulation warm without tangled fabric, transferred down onto the soft carpet inside the walk-in closet, and zipped our shared sleeping bag up to our shoulders before pulling the closet door nearly shut to seal ourselves in quiet, velvet darkness.

Outside in the night, a late-night southbound train glided quietly over the King Street bridge just beyond the trees—heading south through Virginia toward Richmond and Norfolk along the exact steel rails that tied our whole life together.

Inside the warm cocoon of our shared sleeping bag in the dark closet, United States Senator Katie Prairie curled close against my chest, found my hand in the dark, and laced her fingers through mine.

“Goodnight, Nate,” she whispered against my shoulder.

“Goodnight, Katie,” I whispered back, holding my twin sister close as we drifted off to sleep in our sanctuary on Sunset Drive.

Part 4: The Constituent Line in Room 511, ‘Is Nathaniel Still With You?’, & What Really Happened to Natalie

Date: 2027-01-14 at 16:15 America/New_York

Thursday, January 14, 2027, 4:15 PM — “United States Senator Katie Prairie’s Office, This Is Katie Speaking”

“Line Four in the front reception room has been blinking on hold for forty-five seconds while Mandy is on Line One walking a Norfolk shipyard veteran through a Privacy Act casework release and Sarah is tied up on Lines Two and Three triaging constituent calls while Sam is downstairs in Dirksen 124 dropping off our rural transit memo with the Appropriations clerk,” Katie said at quarter past four on Thursday afternoon—just eleven days after she had placed her left palm on the Constitution of the United States in the Old Senate Chamber—glancing up from the appropriations briefing binder on her mahogany desk in Room 511 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

When Katie had built her Class II Senate office from scratch after the November election, the very first three federal staff appointments she had made—with Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge Callaway’s enthusiastic blessing—were twenty-four-year-old Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins. All three triplets were based together here in Dirksen Room 511 with their workstations arranged near one another, commuting in together every morning on Capital Transit with their CapitalPass cards and eating lunch together whenever they wanted without any supervisor ever arbitrarily separating them, while each thrived in their own distinct professional role: Sam as Legislative Correspondent for Transportation, Infrastructure, Disability Policy, and Rural Development; Mandy as Constituent Services Representative running Katie’s predictable six-step federal casework checklist; and Sarah as Staff Assistant and Digital Accessibility Correspondent. And whenever any of them walked over to the Capitol for floor votes, they mentored the sixteen- and seventeen-year-old high-school juniors serving as United States Senate Pages with the exact same color-coded sticky notes and calm, literal instructions that had made Katie and me their safe harbor in Richmond when they were thirteen-year-old eighth-grade House Pages in 2016.

Sitting in my compact black SwiftChair right beside my twin sister's left armrest with my MagnaBook Pro open in front of me, I watched Katie reach over and press the flashing amber rollover button on her multi-line desk console. Ever since her first week on the Virginia Beach City Council seventeen years earlier, Katie had kept the same rule: if a constituent phone line rolled over to her desk while she was in the room, she picked up the receiver herself.

"United States Senator Katie Prairie's office, this is Katie speaking," my sister said warmly as she lifted the handset to her ear. "How can I help you today?"

Through the earpiece, I heard a sudden, startled intake of breath on the other end of the line, followed by the voice of an older Virginia woman speaking from a quiet living room.

"Wait—oh, my goodness," the woman stammered softly. "Is this really Senator Katie Prairie herself answering the telephone?"

"It is, ma'am," Katie smiled, resting her right forearm on her wheelchair armrest. "Every phone in this suite belongs to the people of Virginia. Who do I have the pleasure of speaking with?"

There was a long pause on the line—the sound of a sixty-eight-year-old mother steadying her breath after carrying a weight in her chest for twenty years.

"Senator Prairie, my name is Evelyn Brooks, and I'm calling from home here in Virginia on behalf of my forty-one-year-old daughter, Natalie," the woman said quietly. "I hold full court-ordered legal Guardianship and Conservatorship over Natalie. You may not remember my daughter's name after twenty years, Senator, because my husband and I know that you and your twin brother dropped out of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville after only about a week and a half back in March of 2007."

Sitting beside Katie, I saw my sister's entire body go completely still in her wheelchair.

Her blue eyes widened, and her left hand immediately reached across the gap between our two SwiftChairs and gripped my fingers so tightly her knuckles turned white.

"Did she just say Natalie?" I whispered, my heart slamming against my ribs as the cold mountain air of Thursday morning, March 15, 2007—and the sight of our sweet classmate sobbing and rocking back and forth on the concrete bench outside the RRC cafeteria—rushed back into the room as sharply as if it had happened yesterday.

“Mrs. Brooks,” Katie said into the receiver, her voice dropping an octave as emotion thickened in her throat, “I remember Natalie. I have never forgotten your daughter for a single day in twenty years. How did you know my brother and I were at RRC in March of 2007? We rolled out after twelve days—we never graduated, and we’ve never listed Fishersville on a single biography or resume.”

“Natalie told me, Senator,” Mrs. Brooks replied softly. “Back in October, when you were running for the United States Senate and your campaign commercials came on our living-room television showing you and your brother rolling side by side in your wheelchairs, Natalie sat bolt upright on the sofa and pointed right at the screen. As you know, Natalie is forty-one years old—the exact same age as the two of you—though because of her developmental disability, she has always had the mind and understanding of a six- or seven-year-old child. When she saw your face on the television, she said to me, ‘Mommy, look! That’s Katie and her twin brother from the computer class at the dorms! They were only there for about a week, and she had a white bandage on her nose, and she held my hand by the cafeteria when my tummy hurt before they went away!’ When I looked up your old 2007 dates and called one of the other mothers from that semester, I found out that you and your brother had packed up and left RRC the very same Friday I drove up to Fishersville to bring Natalie home.”

Katie closed her eyes for a second, a single tear slipping down her cheek as she held my hand.

“Senator Prairie…” Mrs. Brooks hesitated on the line, her voice trembling slightly. “Is your twin brother Nathaniel still with you?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Katie answered immediately, looking straight into my eyes across our armrests. “Nate is my Chief of Staff, and he is sitting in his wheelchair right beside me.”

“If he is in the office with you right now,” Mrs. Brooks said, her voice steady and quiet with a mother’s resolve, “please put me on speakerphone, Senator. What I have to tell you is graphic and deeply disturbing, and I have cried over it every night for twenty years—but you and Nathaniel were there in Barton Hall that week, and I want Nathaniel to hear the whole story too.”

On Speakerphone With Evelyn Brooks — The Night of March 14, 2007 & How Fishersville Buried a Crime

“You’re on speakerphone now, Mrs. Brooks, and the door to our office is closed,” Katie said gently, setting the handset back into its cradle as the red speakerphone indicator glowed between our two wheelchairs. “I’m right here, and Nate is right beside me.”

“Hello, Mrs. Brooks,” I said softly toward the console, keeping both of my hands wrapped around Katie’s. “Katie and I are both listening. Please take all the time you need.”

“Thank you, Nathaniel,” Mrs. Brooks said over the speaker, and in the background we could hear the faint, quiet hum of a television turned down low in her Virginia living room. “Before I tell you what happened to my little girl after the two of you saw her outside the cafeteria that Thursday morning, I want you to know that when we sent Natalie to Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in early 2007 for the basic foodservice and life-skills track, DARS promised my late husband and me on a stack of brochures that Barton Hall was a twenty-four-hour supervised, segregated sanctuary. They knew from Natalie's medical and guardianship chart that cognitively she is a first-grader—she trusts adults who tell her they are supposed to be somewhere, she cannot consent to sexual contact under Virginia law, and she did not even have the adult vocabulary to know what sexual intercourse was."

Beside me, Katie's jaw clenched so hard a muscle jumped along her cheek.

"On the night of Wednesday, March 14, 2007," Mrs. Brooks continued, her voice shaking as she spoke the words into the quiet Senate office, "Natalie was already in her cotton nightgown inside her room on the women's wing of Barton Hall after the staff reassigned her former roommate to another hall. As you two saw firsthand that night, the Center's housing database scrambled the male and female room assignments, and instead of stopping to check the gender roster, the front-desk staff blindly handed out active plastic room keycards that unlocked doors on the women's wing to male students."

"Including Chris," I said quietly, my stomach knotting into cold iron as I remembered watching through my laptop webcam as Chris stood in Katie's doorway waving a reassigned keycard just twenty-four hours after breaking Katie's nose open and tearing her swimsuit top in the therapeutic pool.

"His full name was Christopher Vance, and he had already been written up twice for sexually aggressive behavior toward female students before Tuesday's incident in the pool with you, Senator," Mrs. Brooks said. "At nine o'clock that Wednesday night—ten minutes before he walked down the hall and used his keycard on your door, Katie—he used that Center-issued keycard to unlock the door to Natalie's room."

Katie pressed her free hand over her mouth, tears spilling over her eyelashes as Mrs. Brooks's voice cracked on the speakerphone.

"When the door clicked open, Natalie thought it was a dorm counselor checking the room," Mrs. Brooks whispered, fighting through tears. "When she asked him why a boy was in her room, he locked the deadbolt from the inside, told her the front desk had assigned him to her bed, and shoved her down onto the mattress. When she tried to scream for help, he clamped his hand over her mouth and nose until she couldn't breathe, tore her nightgown off, and violently raped my daughter on that dormitory bed. Because Natalie only has the mind of a little child, she didn't even understand what he was doing to her body—she only knew that he was crushing her chest, that she was bleeding, and that the part of his body he used to hurt her felt like she was being torn apart inside. Before he unlocked the door and walked down the hall toward your room, Senator, he told her that if she came out of her room before morning, he would come back with his keycard and kill her. So my terrified child lay curled in a ball on those blood-soaked sheets in the dark all night long without sleeping a single minute."

Across our armrests, Katie was crying silently, her fingers trembling inside mine while a cold, white-hot fury rose behind my eyes.

“On Thursday morning at six-fifteen, when the sun came up, Natalie finally limped out toward the cafeteria in her clothes to find her friends—which is when the two of you, Tina, and Sarah saw her sobbing on the concrete bench outside the dining hall,” Mrs. Brooks said. “You remember what she kept repeating through her tears?”

“That thing… he pees from…” I whispered, the exact words from twenty years ago echoing verbatim in my ears.

“Yes, Nathaniel,” Mrs. Brooks wept softly. “That was the only way her seven-year-old mind knew how to describe what had been done to her. Her friends led her straight from that bench to the campus clinic at seven o’clock in the morning because she was bleeding through her jeans and crying from severe internal pain. And what Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center’s administration did over the next twenty-four hours is something I will never forgive as long as I live.”

Mrs. Brooks drew a long, ragged breath on the speakerphone.

“When the clinic nurse saw the blood and bruising and heard what Natalie said, the nurse notified the Center Director’s office at seven-fifteen,” Mrs. Brooks said, her voice turning hard and clear through her grief. “Under any standard of basic human decency, they should have dialed 911 immediately, called the Virginia State Police and the Augusta County Sheriff’s Office, called me and my husband, and transported Natalie two miles up Route 250 to the emergency room at Augusta Medical Center for emergency medical treatment and a forensic sexual assault examination. They did none of those things. Because the administrators realized immediately that if State Police troopers and a forensic ambulance rolled onto campus, an investigation would expose that their own staff had handed a known predator a keycard to the women’s wing twenty-four hours after he broke your nose in the pool—and that a violent felony rape had occurred inside a state-run dormitory.”

“So at seven-fifty that morning,” Katie said, her voice shaking with cold outrage as the pieces locked together, “while Nate, Tina, Sarah, and I were rolling from the cafeteria to Mr. Alderman’s classroom, we watched two RRC staffers escort Chris out to a passenger van by the front gate with his duffel bag—without a single police car in sight.”

“They drove him straight to the bus station in Staunton, bought him a one-way ticket out of Augusta County with petty cash, and logged his departure as a voluntary administrative withdrawal so his name wouldn’t trigger a state critical-incident audit,” Mrs. Brooks confirmed. “Meanwhile, while they were putting her rapist on a bus, they kept my bleeding, traumatized daughter locked inside a back observation room of the campus infirmary all day Thursday without calling a hospital or the police. While she was in the infirmary, residential housekeeping staff stripped her dormitory bed in Barton Hall and ran her bloodied sheets and nightgown through the industrial laundry with bleach. And at four-thirty on Thursday afternoon—nine and a half hours after Natalie walked into that clinic—a residential administrator finally called our house, lied to my face that Natalie was having a ‘severe behavioral adjustment episode and acute homesickness,’ and told me I needed to drive up to Fishersville on Friday morning to take her home.”

In Room 511, my knuckles were white around Katie’s hand. Neither of us could speak for a moment.

“When I arrived at Barton Hall at ten o’clock on Friday morning, March 16, 2007—just a few hours before you and Nathaniel left for Luray with your classmate Tina—staff rushed Natalie out the front doors with her suitcases already packed and didn’t hand me a single medical chart,” Mrs. Brooks continued. “Thirty-five minutes down Interstate 64, Natalie was whimpering and crying so badly in the passenger seat because it hurt her to sit down that I pulled off at a rest area, took her into the handicapped stall of the restroom, and saw that she was still bleeding through her clothes and covered in dark handprint bruises across her thighs and ribs. I drove straight to the nearest hospital emergency room.”

Mrs. Brooks’s voice broke again, and she paused for three seconds to steady herself.

“The emergency room physician and the forensic nurse examiner documented multiple internal lacerations and bruising consistent with a violent, forcible sexual assault roughly thirty-six to forty hours earlier,” Mrs. Brooks said quietly. “When the hospital called the police and detectives went to Fishersville on Saturday morning, the Center had already bleached the bedding, sanitized the dorm room, sent the perpetrator out of the county without recording a forwarding address, and referred the detectives to DARS legal counsel in Richmond—who immediately threw up Title 34, Section 361.38 of the Code of Federal Regulations, claiming federal Vocational Rehabilitation privacy rules barred them from turning over any student rosters or disciplinary files without a federal court order. By the time our attorney fought through six months of bureaucratic stonewalling, the Commonwealth’s Attorney told us that RRC’s thirty-six-hour cover-up and laundry bleach had destroyed the physical DNA evidence chain they needed to prosecute. For the last twenty years, Natalie has slept with a hallway light on inside my house, terrified whenever a door lock clicks shut.”

Katie wiped the tears from her cheeks with the back of her wrist, her blue eyes blazing like blue steel in the late-afternoon light of Dirksen Room 511.

“Mrs. Brooks,” Katie said, her voice steady, fierce, and absolute, “next month, the Commissioner of DARS and the new Director of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center are coming to this exact room—and then testifying before my Senate Appropriations Subcommittee—to ask for eighteen and a half million dollars in federal funding.”

“I know they are, Senator,” Mrs. Brooks said softly. “Our family attorney saw the Subcommittee schedule published in the federal register on Monday. This morning, in front of a notary public, I executed a formal constituent complaint to your office along with a complete HIPAA and Title 34, Section 361.38 privacy release under my court-ordered Guardianship and Conservatorship, attached to the certified March 16, 2007 hospital emergency room forensic report and the Augusta County Sheriff’s Office incident file. An overnight courier is delivering the sealed packet to Room 511 at nine o’clock tomorrow morning. For twenty years, those bureaucrats hid behind federal privacy laws to protect their funding and bury what they did to my daughter. Now the two students who walked out of Barton Hall that week are sitting in the United States Senate.”

Right then, a gentle, childlike forty-one-year-old voice spoke up from the sofa beside Mrs. Brooks on the other end of the line:

“Hi, Katie! Hi, Nate! Did your nose get all better from the swimming pool?”

My throat closed up completely, and beside me, a fresh tear rolled down Katie's cheek even as she smiled warmly toward the speakerphone as if Natalie could see her through the wire.

"Hi, Natalie," Katie said softly, her voice full of the gentlest warmth in the world. "Yes, sweetie, my nose got all better—and Nate is sitting right here holding my hand, just like he always does."

"Hi, Natalie," I said gently into the microphone. "It is so good to hear your voice."

"Mrs. Brooks," Katie said, her voice ringing with quiet, unbreakable steel, "when DARS and Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center walk into Room 511 on Tuesday, February sixteenth, they aren't going to know that my brother and I are the two twelve-day March 2007 dropouts in their files—or that your signed guardianship waiver and hospital records are sitting right on my desk. And on Thursday morning, February eighteenth, at ten o'clock in Room 124 of the Dirksen Building, I want you and Natalie sitting right in the very front row of the Subcommittee hearing gallery when I put the truth into the permanent Congressional Record of the United States and freeze every single federal dollar they came to ask for."

"We will be in the front row at ten o'clock sharp, Senator Prairie," Evelyn Brooks whispered through her tears. "Thank you—both of you—for not forgetting my little girl."

Friday, January 15, 2027, 9:00 AM — The Overnight Courier Package, The Redacted Pool Report, & Natalie's Drawing

At nine o'clock sharp the next morning, after clearing the Senate Sergeant at Arms off-site courier screening facility, a thick, tamper-sealed cardboard overnight envelope addressed to The Honorable Katie Prairie, United States Senate — PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL CONSTITUENT CASEWORK arrived at the front reception desk of Room 511.

Our legislative director, Sarah—who had sat right beside Katie, Tina, and me in Mr. Alderman's Web Applications Developer classroom at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in March of 2007, and had stood right beside our wheelchairs outside the cafeteria on that cold Thursday morning when Natalie was sobbing on the concrete bench—carried the sealed package into Katie's inner office and closed the heavy mahogany door behind her.

"It just came in from the courier room," Sarah said quietly, setting the package on the desk blotter in front of our two compact SwiftChairs.

Katie slid her letter opener under the tamper-evident tape, pulled out a thick stack of certified documents bound in a green constituent casework folder, and spread the pages across the mahogany desktop so that she, Sarah, and I could read them side by side.

Even after everything Mrs. Brooks had told us over the speakerphone the afternoon before, seeing the twenty-year-old paper trail in stark black and white made the air in the room feel like ice.

On top sat the certified Virginia Circuit Court order appointing Evelyn Brooks as full legal Guardian and Conservator over her adult daughter, Natalie Brooks, clipped directly to a freshly notarized HIPAA medical release and a Title 34, Section 361.38 Vocational Rehabilitation Confidentiality Waiver explicitly authorizing United States Senator Katie Prairie, her Chief of Staff Nathaniel Prairie, and the Senate Committee on Appropriations to inspect, disclose, and enter into the permanent Congressional Record every document relating to Natalie's residency at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center.

Beneath the waiver lay the certified hospital Emergency Department admission record and Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner forensic report dated Friday, March 16, 2007, at 12:15 PM—just two hours after Mrs. Brooks had picked Natalie up at Barton Hall and thirty-five minutes after she had pulled off Interstate 64 at the rest area.

In clinical, unsparing medical detail, the emergency room physician and the forensic nurse had charted the contusions on Natalie's jaw where a hand had been clamped over her mouth and nose, the dark handprint bruises across her ribs and inner thighs, and the acute internal lacerations suffered thirty-six to forty hours earlier on the night of Wednesday, March 14, 2007, while noting that the patient—a twenty-one-year-old woman with the cognitive age of a six-to-seven-year-old child—kept repeating through tears that a boy who unlocked her dorm room door with a plastic keycard had hurt her and threatened to kill her if she came out before morning.

I turned to the third tab in the folder: the supplemental investigative report filed by an Augusta County Sheriff's Office detective on Saturday, March 17, 2007, after the emergency room physician made the mandatory felony law-enforcement notification.

"Look at paragraph four of the detective's narrative," I said quietly, pointing my finger at the photocopied police report so Katie and Sarah could read the lines beside me.

When two Sheriff's Office detectives had driven out to Fishersville on Saturday morning to secure Dormitory Room 142 on the women's wing of Barton Hall, they had discovered that RRC housekeeping staff had stripped the bed on Thursday morning and washed the bloodied sheets and torn nightgown in industrial laundry bleach while Natalie was being held inside a back room of the campus infirmary all day Thursday without a single phone call to 911, the State Police, or Augusta Medical Center. Worse still, the detective noted that the suspect—identified by students as twenty-two-year-old residential client Christopher Vance—had been escorted by two Center staffers into an agency passenger van at 7:50 AM on Thursday, March 15, driven to the bus station in Staunton, and given a one-way bus ticket out of the county with no forwarding address logged in the front-desk ledger.

Then Sarah turned the page to the April 2007 correspondence from the Office of the General Counsel at the Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services in Richmond—and her breath caught in her throat.

"Katie… Nate, look at this attachment," Sarah whispered, her finger trembling against a heavily redacted single-page incident summary that DARS legal counsel had begrudgingly produced after six months of stonewalling the Brooks family's attorney behind Title 34, Section 361.38.

At the top of the page was a one-line log of prior campus behavioral complaints involving Christopher Vance before the night of Wednesday, March 14, 2007. Right above Wednesday night's entry was a heavily blacked-out line dated Tuesday, March 13, 2007, at 4:10 PM:

> Therapeutic Pool Incident: Client C. Vance involved in physical contact in natatorium with female Level 2 client [REDACTED UNDER 34 C.F.R. § 361.38 — STATUS 28 DROPOUT], resulting in nasal epistaxis and damaged swimwear; male sibling [REDACTED UNDER 34 C.F.R. § 361.38 — STATUS 28 DROPOUT] cited by pool staff for unauthorized physical contact and subsequently cited at 23:15 for unauthorized opposite-gender occupancy of locked seasonal storage closet.

Katie stared down at the two black magic-marker bars covering her name and mine.

"That's us," Katie whispered, her voice barely audible in the quiet office. "Under the two black bars on that page… that's you and me, Nate."

"They knew on Tuesday afternoon that he had just broken your nose open and ripped your swimsuit top off in the pool," I said, my voice shaking with cold fury as I looked at the blacked-out lines. "And instead of expelling him and calling the police on Tuesday, they wrote us up for covering your chest and for hiding in the seasonal storage closet in our street clothes so you wouldn't have to be separated from me—left him on campus, handed him a scrambled keycard to the women's wing on Wednesday night so he could unlock Natalie's door and rape her, and then used the exact same federal privacy law to black out our names as Status 28 dropouts so Natalie's mother and the Sheriff's Office couldn't even contact us as witnesses!"

Sarah wiped a tear from the corner of her eye behind her glasses. "If the Brooks family's lawyer had known back in 2007 who the two redacted Status 28 dropouts under those black bars were, Katie, you and I and Nate and Tina would have testified in a heartbeat."

Then Katie lifted the final loose sheet tucked inside the front pocket of the green folder—and all three of us went completely quiet.

It was a single piece of heavy white drawing paper. Drawn across the center in bright wax crayons were two smiling stick-figure twins with yellow hair sitting side by side in black wheelchairs holding hands next to a smiling girl wearing a pink bow in her hair. Across the top of the page, written carefully in big purple crayon block letters by a forty-one-year-old woman whose mind had remained seven years old forever, were six words:

> THANK YOU KATIE AND NATE

Katie held that crayon drawing in both hands for a long moment, her shoulders trembling once before she carefully slipped it into a clear archival protector at the very front of the green constituent casework folder.

Then my twin sister unlocked her wheelchair brakes, turned her SwiftChair toward mine, reached across our armrests, and pulled me into a tight, fierce, two-arm hug—resting her forehead against my shoulder while I wrapped both arms around her back and held her with all the soothing deep pressure I had in me.

When Katie finally sat back and looked up at Sarah and me, every trace of tears was gone, replaced by the calm, surgical focus that had terrified unprepared bureaucrats from City Hall in Virginia Beach to the Capitol in Richmond.

“Sarah,” Katie said quietly, resting her hand on top of the green constituent folder, “confirm the appointment with DARS Commissioner Marcus Sterling and RRC Director Evelyn Cross for Tuesday, February sixteenth, at two o’clock right here in Room 511—the afternoon before they testify on Wednesday morning in front of our Appropriations Subcommittee in Room 124.”

“Do you want me to send them an advance agenda of the questions you’re going to ask?” Sarah asked, uncapping her pen.

“Not a single word,” Katie replied, locking the green constituent folder inside her top desk drawer and slipping the brass key into her blazer pocket as she took my hand across our wheelchair armrests. “Neither of them worked at Fishersville in 2007, and neither of them has any idea who the two redacted Status 28 dropouts on this page are. Let them walk in here with their glossy eighteen-point-five-million-dollar funding binder thinking they can deny everything and hide behind Title 34, Section 361.38—right before Nate and I introduce ourselves.”

Part 5: 34 C.F.R. Section 361.38, Two Twelve-Day Dropouts in Room 511, & Strings Attached at the Subcommittee Hearing

Date: 2027-02-16 at 14:00 America/New_York

Tuesday, February 16, 2027, 2:00 PM — Making Them Squirm Behind 34 C.F.R. Section 361.38 in Dirksen Room 511

“Senator Prairie, on behalf of the Virginia Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services and the entire executive leadership team down in Fishersville, it is such an honor to welcome a champion of the disability community to the Senate Appropriations Committee,” Commissioner Marcus Sterling beamed across the polished mahogany desk of Room 511 in the Dirksen Senate Office Building, sliding a glossy spiral-bound presentation book toward Katie’s wheelchair while the new director of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center, Dr. Evelyn Cross, nodded eagerly beside him.

Sitting in my compact black SwiftChair right beside my twin sister’s left armrest with my MagnaBook Pro open on the corner of the desk and Katie’s legislative director, Sarah, seated with her legal pad to our right, I watched the two state agency executives settle back into their leather visitor chairs.

Neither Commissioner Sterling nor Director Cross had worked in Fishersville twenty years earlier in March of 2007; both were newly appointed career administrators who had taken over their roles within the past three years. Better still, neither of them had the faintest idea that the forty-one-year-old United States Senator sitting across from them—or her twin brother beside her—had ever set foot on the campus of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center.

Why would they? On every campaign biography, on our software company’s corporate profile, and in the official Congressional Directory of the One Hundred Twentieth Congress, both Katie and I listed the exact same two academic credentials we had actually earned: an Advanced Studies Diploma from Virginia Beach City Public Schools at Northwood High School in June 2003, and an Associate of Applied Science degree from the Community College of Hampton Roads in December 2006.

We never listed Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center on a resume because, technically, Katie and I were RRC dropouts. We had rolled out of Barton Hall after twelve days in March 2007 without completing the program, without sitting for an exit interview, and without earning a certificate—and not long after we had returned home to our house on Arvin Road in Virginia Beach and worked on a few of the copied classroom modules unofficially from home, we had decided to stop bothering with RRC's rigid exercises altogether and start doing our own thing.

"As you'll see on page four of our briefing packet, Senator," Director Cross said smoothly, tapping a color photograph of the flat-roofed red-brick dormitories along Roosevelt Avenue in Fishersville, "we are asking your office to sponsor an eighteen-point-five-million-dollar Congressionally Directed Spending request in this week's Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education Appropriations Subcommittee markup. The funds will support residential dormitory administration in Barton Hall and Cantor Hall, expand our two-week Vocational Evaluation intake division in the Bates-Harding Building, and fund our administrative compliance office."

Katie didn't even open the glossy spiral binder. Resting her hands calmly on the armrests of her SwiftChair, she looked straight across the mahogany desk at Director Cross and Commissioner Sterling.

"Before we talk about eighteen and a half million federal tax dollars, Director Cross, I have a few specific operational questions about how Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center treats the adults who check into Barton Hall," Katie said in a mild, conversational tone. "Let's say a twenty-one-year-old twin brother and sister—both full-time wheelchair users with progressive neuromuscular weakness, and both already holding accredited Associate of Applied Science degrees in information technology from the Community College of Hampton Roads—arrive at your center specifically to take the Web Applications Developer course in server-side PHP and SQL."

Beside me, I saw Director Cross blink once, her polite smile freezing slightly at the corners.

"First," Katie continued evenly, "when those two twenty-one-year-old wheelchair users roll up to the Barton Hall counter or walk down the hallway of the Bates-Harding Building, do your residential aides and vocational evaluation staff still walk up behind them and grab the rear push-handles of their wheelchairs to shove them around without asking permission—and then threaten to write the clients up as aggressive when they tell the staff to take their hands off their chairs?"

"Well—Senator, certainly our staff are trained to assist mobility-impaired clients—" Director Cross began.

"Second," Katie pressed on without letting her pivot, "why would two twenty-one-year-old wheelchair users who already hold accredited associate degrees in computer science be forced to spend two weeks in Vocational Evaluation touring the auto mechanics shop, the woodworking shop, and the nursing assistant lab—and then be told by an evaluator that if software engineering proves too taxing, the Center has a wonderful partnership with the Waynesboro ValueMart to train a college-degreed woman in a wheelchair to sit by the sliding doors as a ValueMart door greeter?"

Across the desk, Commissioner Sterling shifted uncomfortably in his leather chair, glancing sideways at Director Cross.

"Third," Katie said, her blue eyes sharp and unblinking, "let's say those twins test out of your two-week Vocational Evaluation in a single week so they can start the Web Applications Developer class—where every student has to bring a personal laptop because VITA has locked the state desktop computers down so tightly on a seven-year-old operating system that nobody can even start a local web server. Because moving to Cantor Hall is part of earning Level 3, and they haven't been on campus long enough to earn Level 3, they remain stuck in Barton Hall on Level 2—forced to beg for signed yellow paper Hall Passes just to catch the local bus, and forced onto separate men's and women's wings every night at eleven o'clock."

Director Cross's cheeks flushed pink, and she cleared her throat. "Senator Prairie, if someone has shared an anecdote with your office—"

"I'm not finished, Director," Katie said calmly. "Suppose on their ninth afternoon on campus, a male classmate assaults the twin sister in the therapeutic pool—splitting the skin across the bony bridge of her nose, causing a heavy nosebleed, and tearing her swimsuit top so that Student Health nurses have to pull the split bridge of her nose together with sterile MedStrip wound-closure strips and tape a white gauze bandage across her nose that she has to wear for seven straight days—and when her twin brother uses his hands on the pool deck to cover her bare chest until someone brings a towel, your poolside staffer writes him up for inappropriate contact. And when the traumatized sister—with fresh white tape and MedStrips across her swollen nose—doesn't want to be separated from her twin brother that night, so at ten-forty-five they slip down a darkened hallway from the Rec Hall in their street clothes and lock themselves inside a seasonal storage closet using lumpy bags of curtains as pillows, your night supervisor unlocks the door with a master key after the eleven-o'clock curfew check, automatically accuses a twin brother and sister in full street clothes of sneaking into a closet to have sex, and threatens to kick them out of the Center—until the twins call his bluff and dare him to call their father in Alexandria right then and there to come pick them up, at which point the supervisor backs down because losing two full-time residential students would hurt the Center's headcount funding, while the counseling staff prepares to slap them with a Level 1 restriction and a mandatory sibling separation contract."

In the quiet mahogany-paneled Senate office, you could have heard a pin drop.

Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross squirmed visibly in their chairs, exchanging a bewildered, increasingly uneasy look across the corner of the desk.

"Senator Prairie," Director Cross said slowly, her brow furrowing as she looked from Katie's face to mine and back again, "with all due respect… why are you being so oddly specific about a twenty-year-old incident? You're reciting the exact color of our Level 2 Hall Passes in Barton Hall, VITA's old desktop permissions in the computer lab, a Waynesboro ValueMart door-greeter pitch, MedStrip wound-closure strips under a seven-day nasal bandage from Student Health, and even plastic bags of curtains inside a seasonal storage closet at ten-forty-five at night. None of that would ever appear in a Senate briefing book—or even on a standard state incident form. How could you possibly know all of that?"

"And frankly, Senator," Commissioner Sterling jumped in, his voice tightening with a mixture of confusion and alarm as he tried to figure out who could have briefed her, "I don't understand why we are even talking about an oddly hyperspecific anecdote from March of 2007 when neither Dr. Cross nor I was employed at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center twenty years ago, and when our administration has no knowledge whatsoever of any twin siblings ever being treated in the manner you just described. Furthermore, even if someone claiming to be a former client from 2007 contacted your office with those allegations, you know our hands are tied by federal law. Under Title 34, Section 361.38 of the Code of Federal Regulations governing the State Vocational Rehabilitation Services Program, all personal client case files, disciplinary logs, and vocational evaluation records are strictly confidential. We are legally prohibited from confirming, denying, or discussing any individual client's personal file—even with a United States Senator—without an explicit written privacy release signed by the former clients themselves."

Katie let the silence hang across the mahogany desk for five full seconds, watching the two executives squirm behind their federal privacy statute while they thought they had successfully walled off the question.

Then Katie reached across our wheelchair armrests, laced her fingers through mine, and looked Director Cross and Commissioner Sterling dead in the eye.

"You don't need to worry about violating Title 34, Section 361.38 of the Code of Federal Regulations, Commissioner Sterling," Katie said softly. "Because the twenty-one-year-old twin brother and sister in those March 2007 Barton Hall files are sitting right across this desk from you."

Every drop of color drained out of Director Cross's face. Commissioner Sterling's jaw literally dropped open.

"My twin brother Nathaniel and I checked into Barton Hall on Sunday, March 4, 2007, and we rolled out twelve days later after watching how your center operated," Katie said, her voice steady and cold as steel. "We were never interested in the rehabilitation part of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center—we only came to Fishersville for the Web Applications Developer class, and we fully intended to treat your center like college: go to class, sleep in the dorm, and be done with it. We were not prepared for the juvenile rules, or the mandatory Vocational Evaluation, or being talked down to like children. In your DARS computer database in Richmond, the junior United States Senator from Virginia and her twin brother are officially coded as Status 28 unsuccessful rehabilitation dropouts—because after we rolled out of Barton Hall and spent a few days working on the copied PHP modules from our house in Virginia Beach, we decided to stop wasting our time on your modules and build our own software company instead of becoming a ValueMart door greeter. And right here, across this desk, Nathaniel and I waive our confidentiality."

"S-Senator Prairie," Commissioner Sterling stammered, his hand trembling against his briefing binder, "we had no idea—your official biography only lists the Community College of Hampton Roads—"

“Because we didn’t graduate from Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center—we dropped out after twelve days when we saw what a bureaucratic circus it was,” I said evenly from my wheelchair beside Katie. “And wait until you hear why our Thursday morning Level 1 restriction meeting with our counselor never happened on March 15, 2007.”

Katie reached to her right, picked up the thick manila constituent casework folder that had arrived by courier a month earlier after our January phone call with Evelyn Brooks, and laid it open directly on top of Director Cross’s glossy funding brochure.

“On Wednesday night, March 14, 2007,” Katie said, tapping the sworn affidavit clipped inside the folder, “your dorm database was scrambled, and your front-desk staff blindly followed the computer printout and handed out room keycards that put men into women’s rooms. The exact same male student who broke my nose in your therapeutic pool on Tuesday afternoon used a reassigned keycard to enter the women’s wing, where he raped our classmate Natalie—a chronologically adult woman who has the cognitive capacity of a young child. And on Thursday, March 15, 2007, while your counseling wing canceled our ten-o’clock closet write-up meeting because the housing roster was in chaos, your administration put Natalie’s rapist into a passenger van at seven-fifty in the morning and escorted him off the property without calling the police, held a bleeding, traumatized young woman inside your campus infirmary all day without a forensic exam while washing her dormitory bedsheets in the campus laundry, and lied to her mother that she was merely having a homesickness episode—sweeping a violent campus rape under the rug so it wouldn’t appear on a state incident report.”

“Senator,” Director Cross whispered, her voice shaking, “again, under federal confidentiality rules, we could never discuss another client’s—”

“Read the top page of that folder, Director Cross,” Katie said flatly. “Natalie’s mother, Evelyn Brooks, holds full legal Guardianship and Conservatorship over Natalie under the laws of the Commonwealth of Virginia. Last month, after Natalie recognized my brother and me on television from our week and a half in Fishersville and watched my swearing-in ceremony, Mrs. Brooks called this office directly and filed an official constituent complaint against Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center and DARS with her United States Senator—complete with the hospital emergency room records from March 16, 2007 and a notarized HIPAA and 34 C.F.R. Section 361.38 privacy waiver signed by Natalie’s mother as her legal guardian and conservator. And both Natalie and her mother will be sitting in the front row of Room 124 on Wednesday morning when the two of you testify under oath before the Appropriations Subcommittee.”

Neither Commissioner Sterling nor Director Cross said another word. Gathering up their briefcases with visibly shaking hands—and forgetting their glossy spiral-bound funding book on the corner of Katie’s desk—the two executives practically stumbled backward out of Room 511. Through the open doorway of our outer reception suite, Sarah, Katie, and I heard both of them frantically pulling out their phones before they even reached the fifth-floor elevators, speed-dialing their superiors in Richmond and the records office in Fishersville to beg for guidance.

Watching the heavy oak door click shut behind them, I looked over at Katie and Sarah. “Ten bucks says the two of them are already trying to figure out how to bail on Wednesday morning’s Subcommittee hearing and drive straight back to Richmond.”

Less than an hour later—while Katie, Sarah, and I were sitting around the mahogany desk finalizing our five-page statutory appropriations rider—the red light on Line One of Katie's desk phone flashed.

Having served across Capitol Square from the Governor's Mansion during her years in the General Assembly, the Governor's Chief of Staff, Arthur Lawrence, knew exactly who Katie Prairie was, knew that I was always right beside her, and knew that she almost always answered her direct office line herself.

Katie reached over and pressed the speakerphone button. "Senator Katie Prairie."

"Katie—Senator Prairie—it's Arthur Lawrence in the Governor's Office in Richmond," the Chief of Staff's voice came through the speaker grille in full, breathless damage-control mode. "Is Nate there at the desk with you?"

"I'm right here, Arthur," I answered.

"Good," Lawrence said grimly. "I have Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross conferenced in on this line from their parked car in Washington because I want them to hear every word of this directly. Forty minutes ago, after they walked out of your office and called the Secretary of Health and Human Resources in a panic, I personally ordered DARS General Counsel in Richmond and the records custodian in Fishersville to pull the unredacted March 2007 paper archive from the vault. Everything you and Nate told them—every single word about Barton Hall, the Tuesday afternoon pool assault, the two blacked-out Status 28 dropout lines on the April 2007 summary, and the Thursday morning van to the Staunton bus station—is sitting on my desk right now in black and white. The Governor is livid, and on behalf of the Commonwealth, I cannot tell you how sorry we are for what happened to Natalie Brooks and for how the two of you were treated twenty years ago."

"Save the apology for Natalie and her mother in Room 124 tomorrow morning, Arthur," Katie said evenly. "Why are Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross sitting in a parked car instead of reading our statutory reform checklist?"

"Because ten minutes ago, Senator, both of them asked the Secretary and me for permission to pull out of tomorrow morning's Subcommittee witness panel and drive straight back to Richmond tonight," Lawrence admitted flatly—before his voice hardened into a thunderclap aimed straight at the two state executives on the conference line. "And as I just told both of you before we dialed the Senator's direct line—and as I am repeating right now in front of Senator Prairie and Nate—you are out of your minds if you think the Governor of Virginia is letting either of you run back to Richmond! Do you have any idea what happens if the Commissioner of DARS and the Director of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center pull a no-show in front of Virginia's own United States Senator on the Appropriations Subcommittee?! You won't just cost Fishersville eighteen and a half million dollars—you will jeopardize the Commonwealth's entire ninety-two-million-dollar share of federal Title I Rehabilitation Act matching funds! Neither of you is leaving Washington. I am ordering both of you right now: check into your hotel, walk into Dirksen Room 124 at ten o'clock on Wednesday morning, sit behind those microphones while Senator Prairie enters every page of the 2007 record into the Congressional Record, and agree under oath to every single reform her office puts in front of you without one word of pushback. Do both of you hear me?!"

Over the speakerphone, two small, hollow voices answered from the parked car:

“Yes, Mr. Lawrence,” Commissioner Sterling said quietly.

“Yes, sir,” Director Cross whispered.

Katie leaned forward over the armrests of her SwiftChair, looking straight down at the speakerphone grille.

“And let me make one promise to all three of you right now, Arthur,” Katie said, her voice calm and cold as ice. “If Director Cross and Commissioner Sterling do not show up at that witness table for the Subcommittee hearing on Wednesday morning, they won’t be hiding in Richmond or Fishersville—they will be facing compulsory subpoenas from the United States Senate.”

She had chosen every word with surgical precision. An individual Senator couldn’t unilaterally conjure a subpoena into existence on her own say-so—Senate committees and subcommittees operated under strict chamber and committee rules governing how compulsory process was authorized and issued—and Katie wasn’t pretending otherwise. She was warning the Governor’s Chief of Staff that the moment voluntary cooperation ended, she was prepared to walk straight to the Subcommittee Chair and the full Committee leadership to initiate formal compulsory congressional process.

And Arthur Lawrence, who knew Capitol politics inside and out, heard the unspoken final sentence behind her words loud and clear: Arthur, get them into those chairs voluntarily, because neither you nor the Governor wants to find out what happens next.

“They will be in their seats at nine-forty-five sharp, Senator,” Lawrence said quickly. “You have my word.”

Wednesday, February 17, 2027, 10:00 AM — The Subcommittee Hearing & Strings Attached on Every Federal Dollar

Less than twenty hours later, at ten o’clock on Wednesday morning inside Room 124 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the crystal chandeliers gleamed above the curved mahogany dais of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies.

Sitting in my SwiftChair in the staff bay immediately behind Katie’s custom-ramped place on the Subcommittee dais, I looked out past the green-baize witness table—where Commissioner Marcus Sterling and Director Evelyn Cross sat stiffly behind their microphones—to the very first row of the public seating gallery.

Sitting side by side in the front row were forty-one-year-old Natalie and her sixty-eight-year-old mother Evelyn, holding hands as they looked up at Katie on the dais.

“The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia, Senator Prairie, for five minutes of questioning,” the Subcommittee Chairman announced, tapping his gavel gently.

Katie leaned slightly toward her microphone from her SwiftChair, her royal-blue blazer crisp beneath the television lights.

“Thank you, Mr. Chairman,” Katie said clearly. “Commissioner Sterling, Director Cross, before we begin, I ask unanimous consent to enter into the permanent hearing record the sworn constituent complaint, March 2007 hospital emergency room documentation, and signed guardianship privacy release submitted by Evelyn Brooks—a Virginia mother who holds legal Guardianship and Conservatorship over her daughter, Natalie—detailing the events of March 14 through March 16, 2007 at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville, Virginia. And for the public record, I will state in open session what I shared with both of you in my office on Tuesday: in March of 2007, my twin brother Nathaniel and I spent twelve days as residential Level 2 clients in Barton Hall at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center before dropping out.”

A quiet murmur rippled across the press table and the staff benches along the wall as reporters scribbled furiously in their notebooks.

“During those twelve days in March 2007,” Katie continued, her voice ringing with calm, forensic precision across the marble hearing room, “my brother and I—already holding Associate of Applied Science degrees from the Community College of Hampton Roads—had our wheelchair push-handles grabbed without our consent by Center staff, and were forced to tour auto mechanics, woodworking, and nursing shops before being pitched on a partnership with ValueMart to work as a door greeter. Then, on Tuesday, March 13, 2007, a male student assaulted me in the therapeutic pool—breaking my nose open and ripping my swimsuit top off, which forced my twin brother to use his hands to cover my exposed chest until someone brought a towel. Instead of expelling the attacker, RRC staff wrote my brother up for covering my chest, and when my brother and I locked ourselves in a storage closet together that night in our street clothes because I was too traumatized to be separated onto different wings, staff accused us of having sex and threatened us with expulsion and a Level 1 dorm-grounding and sibling-separation contract—while leaving my attacker right there on campus, handing him a scrambled keycard to the women’s wing the very next night so that the exact same perpetrator who broke my nose and ripped my swimsuit top off was able to unlock Natalie’s door and rape her in the dormitories, before Center administration escorted him into a van on the morning of March 15, 2007 and sent him off campus without calling the police.”

At the witness table, Commissioner Sterling swallowed hard into his microphone. “Senator Prairie, as we expressed to you on Tuesday, neither Dr. Cross nor I was with the agency in 2007, and we are horrified by what Natalie and her family—and you and your brother—experienced twenty years ago.”

“Words don’t reform institutions, Commissioner—appropriations language does,” Katie replied evenly. “You have come to Washington asking this Subcommittee for eighteen point five million dollars in federal funding. As a United States Senator from Virginia sitting on this Committee, let me make my position crystal clear: I refuse to entertain a single federal dollar for Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center or the Virginia Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services until you carry out the specific institutional reforms my office has placed on this table.”

Holding up the five-page statutory rider I had drafted with Sarah the night before, Katie read the strings attached into the Congressional Record one by one:

“First, DARS and Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center will issue a formal written institutional apology to Natalie and her mother, open their 2007 administrative files to an independent audit by the Virginia Office of the State Inspector General, and adopt an ironclad, zero-tolerance mandatory reporting policy requiring Center staff to notify the Virginia State Police and local law enforcement within one hour of any report of sexual or physical assault on campus—with immediate termination and criminal referral for any administrator who attempts to escort a suspect off property, tamper with physical evidence, or conceal a crime to protect campus statistics.

“Second, the Center handbook and staff training manual will be permanently amended to recognize that a wheelchair is an extension of the person sitting in it, prohibiting any staff member from grabbing or pushing a client’s wheelchair or push-handles without explicit consent.

“Third, DARS will end the practice of forcing clients who already hold accredited college degrees or documented technical proficiencies through two-week manual-trade Vocational Evaluation tours or pitching them low-wage retail greeter placements just to pad evaluation rosters, and will ensure that vocational technology classrooms are equipped with modern, unlocked developer workstations rather than outdated VITA-locked desktops.

“Fourth, Residential Services will abolish forced daytime separation directives and punitive Level 1 isolation contracts against adult family members and siblings who rely on one another for disability and sensory support.

“And fifth, federal disbursement will be tied to independent audits of real educational and career outcomes—never to ‘butts-in-seats’ residential headcount quotas.”

Katie lowered the statutory rider onto her desk and looked squarely down from the dais at the two administrators.

“Until those five reforms are signed, implemented, and verified in Fishersville, Commissioner Sterling, my hold on your federal funding remains in place. Do we understand each other?”

At the witness table, Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross sat frozen under the television lights, the tiny red recording lamps glowing on the necks of their microphones while the stenographer’s fingers hovered over her stenotype machine.

“Yes, Senator Prairie,” Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross answered into their microphones in unison. “We will implement every single one of them.”

If Sterling and Cross had been hoping that a quick verbal surrender would run out the five-minute clock and allow them to slip out of Dirksen Room 124 before the national cameras zoomed in any closer, they had badly misjudged the United States Senate.

At the center of the curved mahogany dais, Senator Arthur Harrington—the silver-haired Chairman of the full Appropriations Committee—leaned forward and clicked on his microphone, exchanging a single grim nod with the Subcommittee’s Ranking Republican Member beside him.

“Before the Senator from Virginia’s initial five minutes expire, let the Chair state the position of this Committee so there is zero ambiguity down in Richmond or Fishersville,” Chairman Harrington said, his deep voice booming off the marble walls. “On the Senate Appropriations Committee, no home-state Congressionally Directed Spending request moves a single inch without the affirmative support of the home-state Senator. Senator Prairie’s hold on this eighteen-point-five-million-dollar line item is absolute. Furthermore, the Ranking Member and I have just instructed the Committee clerk to add both of our names as original bipartisan cosponsors to Senator Prairie's five-point statutory rider—and this Subcommittee is transmitting today's hearing transcript and exhibits directly to the Rehabilitation Services Administration at the Department of Education and the Office for Civil Rights at the Department of Health and Human Services for an immediate federal Title I compliance audit of the Virginia Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services. Without objection, the Chair yields an additional five minutes to Senator Prairie so these witnesses can answer her remaining questions under oath."

At the green-baize witness table, Director Cross closed her eyes for a fraction of a second as the last of the color drained from her cheeks. A home-state Senator's hold had just become a bipartisan Committee mandate backed by two federal oversight investigations.

"Thank you, Mr. Chairman," Katie said, picking up the second folder I had set beside her armrest. "Commissioner Sterling, let's talk about what happens between now and five o'clock this Friday afternoon. Under Section 19.2-8 of the Code of Virginia, there is no statute of limitations on a felony in the Commonwealth of Virginia. Felony forcible rape under Section 18.2-61 can be indicted and prosecuted twenty days after the crime, or twenty years after the crime."

Along the press table, every reporter's pen stopped in midair as they looked up at the dais.

"For twenty years," Katie continued, her voice steady and unflinching, "Evelyn and Natalie Brooks have kept the March 16, 2007 hospital emergency room forensic examination report, the triage records, and the photographs of Natalie's injuries safe in their files—while Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center locked the perpetrator's full legal identity, counselor intake file, electronic keycard door-lock audit log from the night of Wednesday, March 14, 2007, campus infirmary admission chart, laundry bleaching work order, and Thursday morning van dispatch log inside your vault in Fishersville behind Title 34, Section 361.38 of the Code of Federal Regulations. Yesterday afternoon, after you left my office, your archives staff in Richmond and Fishersville pulled those unredacted March 2007 records out of storage. And as your General Counsel knows full well, Section 361.38(e)(5) explicitly authorizes the release of vocational rehabilitation records in connection with a law enforcement investigation of a criminal offense."

Katie leaned an inch closer to her microphone, locking her blue eyes on the Commissioner.

"Commissioner Sterling, Director Cross—will you commit on the record right now to turning over the complete, unredacted March 2007 administrative, security, keycard, infirmary, and transport records for the perpetrator who assaulted me in the therapeutic pool on March 13 and raped Natalie Brooks on March 14 to the Virginia State Police Bureau of Criminal Investigation and the Augusta County Commonwealth's Attorney before five o'clock this Friday afternoon?"

"Yes, Senator Prairie," Commissioner Sterling said hoarsely into his microphone. "I have already instructed our General Counsel to assemble the complete unredacted 2007 files. They will be hand-delivered to the Virginia State Police Bureau of Criminal Investigation and the Augusta County Commonwealth's Attorney before five o'clock this Friday."

“Good,” Katie said. “Now let’s address the falsified administrative coding in your agency’s mainframe. When Evelyn Brooks drove to Fishersville on Friday, March 16, 2007 and rescued her traumatized, bleeding daughter from your campus infirmary, Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center didn’t log a campus violent felony. Instead, your predecessors coded Natalie Brooks in the DARS mainframe as a voluntary ‘homesickness’ withdrawal and a Status 28 ‘Unsuccessful Rehabilitation’ dropout—the exact same Status 28 failure code your system placed next to my name and my twin brother’s name when we rolled out of Barton Hall that very same afternoon.”

Behind Katie’s wheelchair on the dais, I saw two Senate aides along the back wall shake their heads in disbelief at the sheer audacity of a state agency coding a sitting United States Senator—and a sexual assault survivor—as “unsuccessful rehabilitations.”

“My brother and I don’t care what code your computer in Richmond has next to our names, Dr. Cross—Nate and I wear being twelve-day RRC dropouts as a badge of honor,” Katie said evenly. “But Natalie Brooks did not drop out of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center because she was homesick, and she did not fail rehabilitation. Your center failed her. Before this Subcommittee marks up your budget next week, you will formally expunge every falsified ‘homesickness’ and ‘Status 28’ entry from Natalie Brooks’s permanent record, replace them with an official administrative finding documenting the true reason she left Fishersville on March 16, 2007, and reimburse Evelyn Brooks in full for every dollar of out-of-pocket medical and trauma counseling care your agency refused to cover twenty years ago. Do I have your commitment?”

“Yes, Senator Prairie,” Director Cross answered, her voice trembling slightly into the microphone. “Her record will be expunged and corrected immediately, and our agency will provide full restitution for her medical and counseling care.”

Katie glanced at the amber digital countdown clock on the edge of the dais—ninety seconds remaining—and then looked out past the green-baize witness table toward the first row of the public seating gallery.

“I have one final requirement before I yield back to the Chairman,” Katie said softly, though the acoustics of Room 124 carried every syllable to the back corners of the chamber. “Twenty years ago on Roosevelt Avenue in Fishersville, the administrators sitting in your chairs kept a twenty-one-year-old woman with the sweet, trusting heart of a seven-year-old child locked inside your campus infirmary for thirty-two hours while housekeeping bleached her bedsheets, and when her mother arrived to take her home, they wouldn’t even look Evelyn Brooks in the eye when they lied to her face. Evelyn and Natalie Brooks took the early morning train up to Washington today, and they are sitting ten feet behind your backs in the very first row of this hearing room.”

Every camera lens in the room pivoted toward the front row of the gallery, where sixty-eight-year-old Evelyn Brooks sat with her arm around forty-one-year-old Natalie.

“Commissioner Sterling, Director Cross,” Katie said, “before you leave that table, I want both of you to turn around in your chairs, look Natalie and Evelyn Brooks in the eye, and give them the apology the Commonwealth of Virginia has owed them since March 15, 2007.”

For three long seconds, neither administrator moved. Then, slowly, under the silent, unblinking gaze of every Senator on the dais, Marcus Sterling and Evelyn Cross pushed their leather witness chairs back from the green-baize table, stood up, and turned completely around to face the front row of the public gallery.

Standing ten feet in front of Natalie and her mother with the press cameras clicking softly along the wall, both executives bowed their heads.

“Mrs. Brooks, Natalie,” Commissioner Sterling said, his voice carrying clearly across the quiet aisle without a microphone, “on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia and the Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services, I am deeply, profoundly sorry for the horrific harm done to you at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in March of 2007, and for the twenty years our agency spent hiding the truth instead of standing beside you.”

“We failed to protect you when you were in our care, Natalie, and what was done to you and your mother was inexcusable,” Director Cross added quietly, looking straight into Mrs. Brooks’s eyes. “We are so sorry.”

In the front row, Evelyn Brooks held her daughter’s hand tightly against her coat, tears spilling down her cheeks, and gave a single, solemn nod—not of easy forgiveness for an institution that still had to prove itself in action, but of a mother who had finally forced the state to speak the truth in the light of day.

“Thank you, Mr. Chairman,” Katie said into her microphone. “I yield back.”

Wednesday, February 17, 2027, 11:15 AM — Twenty Years Since the Barton Hall Cafeteria

The moment Chairman Harrington rapped his gavel to recess the morning witness panel, Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross hastily gathered their folders and slipped out the side corridor with their legal counsel to begin placing calls to the Virginia State Police and Richmond.

Up on the dais, Katie and I unlocked the brakes of our SwiftChairs at the exact same second. Steering down the custom carpeted side ramp off the Senate rostrum in tight parallel formation, we rolled out through the brass gate into the front aisle of Dirksen Room 124, stopping right in front of the first row of the gallery.

For the first time in twenty years—not since that grey March week in 2007 outside the noisy double doors of the Barton Hall cafeteria—we were looking at Natalie face-to-face.

At forty-one years old, Natalie wore a neat lavender cardigan over a floral dress, with a silver heart locket around her neck and a small canvas tote bag in her lap. The instant our two black motorized SwiftChairs glided to a stop in front of her row, Natalie’s eyes went wide with pure, radiant recognition.

“Katie! Nate!” Natalie gasped happily, standing up beside her mother and reaching both hands straight out toward our wheelchairs—the exact pose she had drawn with her purple and blue crayons on the piece of white construction paper that was now framed in brushed gold behind Katie’s desk upstairs in Room 511.

Katie and I both leaned forward over our armrests, Katie taking Natalie's right hand in hers while I took Natalie's left hand in mine.

"Hi, Natalie," Katie said, her voice thick with emotion as a warm tear slipped down her cheek and she smiled up at her old classmate. "It is so good to see you again."

"It's really good to see you, Natalie," I said warmly, giving her fingers a gentle squeeze. "We loved the picture you drew for us so much that Katie hung it up in a shiny gold frame right on the wall of her Senate office."

Natalie beamed from ear to ear, looking back and forth between my wheelchair and Katie's. Then she tilted her head, peering down curiously at the black motorized drive wheels and the compact joystick controllers mounted on our armrests.

"You got new chairs with little driving sticks!" Natalie marveled delightedly. "When we were at the school by the cafeteria, you had the push-wheelchairs with the big circles on the wheels, just like I drew in my picture! And Katie, you talked so loud and brave on the big microphone up there! You told those people they aren't allowed to let mean boys have keys to the girls' rooms ever again!"

"Never again, Natalie," Katie promised softly, squeezing her hand with both of hers. "Not to you, and not to anyone else."

Standing beside her daughter, sixty-eight-year-old Evelyn Brooks reached down and placed her hand over ours, her eyes shining through her tears as she looked at Katie and me sitting side by side in our wheelchairs.

"For twenty years, every door I knocked on in Virginia was slammed in my face with a federal code number," Mrs. Brooks whispered. "It took the two kids who walked out of that place after twelve days to finally tear the wall down."

Beside Katie's wheelchair in the middle of the Senate hearing room, I looked at Natalie smiling brightly down at us, and then across at my twin sister—two twelve-day RRC dropouts who had gone home to do their own thing, and had just rewritten the rules for every disabled student who would ever roll through the doors of Fishersville again.

The Norfolk Carrier Leak, Suite 756 at Timberline Shopping Center, & Three Convictions in the Senate

Part 1: The South Lawn Tirade, The Norfolk Carrier Leak, & Why the Order of the Trials Matters

Date: 2027-03-18 at 10:15 America/New_York

Thursday, March 18, 2027, 10:15 AM — "He Thinks He's Brandon Mercer" & The No Vote at Eleven-Fifteen

Inside Room 511 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the wall-mounted television was tuned to a live morning press availability on the South Lawn of the White House, where President Garrett Thorne was shouting over the helicopter rotor wash at a cluster of reporters.

"You want to know why my nominee for Deputy Secretary of Transportation is still stalled in committee?" Thorne barked into the microphones, jabbing a thick finger toward Capitol Hill. "Because Broken Katie Prairie—a nasty, bitter little cripple who can't even walk up the steps of the Capitol without taxpayers building her a ramp—is running a personal vendetta from her wheelchair! Look at her! She's slow, she has no stamina, forty-one years old, never married, couldn't keep a real man when she was twenty, still living in her father's house in Alexandria with her crippled twin brother writing little computer spreadsheets for her! She's defective, folks—physically and mentally defective—and the Senate Commerce Committee shouldn't be held hostage by a spinster on wheels!"

Across the private office, Katie's paid legislative director, Sarah, reached for the remote control to mute the screen, her face pale with anger.

"Leave the volume up, Sarah," Katie said calmly from behind her custom-height mahogany Senator's desk, not even looking up from the red-tabbed confirmation binder open across her lap.

Parked in my compact SwiftChair right beside my twin sister's left armrest, I didn't flinch either. My fingers didn't even pause on the mechanical keyboard of my MagnaBook Pro as I finished compiling the final cross-referenced PHP table of wire transfers between Thorne Global Holdings, an offshore maritime logistics shell company, and the nominee's former shipping lobby firm.

Because federal anti-nepotism law under Title 5, Section 3110 of the United States Code barred a Member of Congress from hiring a sibling onto a paid government payroll, I didn't take a single dime of taxpayer salary. I was a private citizen, earning our living through the fifty-fifty software business Katie and I had built from our wheelchairs, and serving in Dirksen Room 511 as my sister's unpaid chief data strategist—while Katie alone held the constitutional office of United States Senator from Virginia, chaired her subcommittee on the dais, and cast the official votes on the floor.

"He thinks he's Brandon Mercer," I said quietly, turning my laptop screen ten degrees toward Katie's SwiftChair so she could read the bottom wire-transfer totals. "He thinks if he stands over the back of our chairs and screams loud enough about how broken we are, we're going to flinch."

"Brandon found out twenty-one years ago what happens when you try to corner us, and so will Garrett Thorne," Katie said, closing the confirmation binder with a sharp snap. "Remember during the 2024 campaign when Thorne started walking out at his rallies and blasting the 1993 Runebreaker Live stadium version of The Grand Decree as his campaign theme song without asking permission—because nobody on his staff bothered to check that it was literally the villain song about a tyrant ruling by executive decree who gets taken down by a pair of fraternal twins?"

I couldn't help grinning at the memory. Engine Room Records maintained a strict, across-the-board policy prohibiting any song in its catalog from being used for political campaigns—having made a very rare exception only for our campaign's use of The Accessibility Project—so within forty-eight hours of Thorne's campaign uploading those rally videos in 2024, every single one of them had been hit with copyright claims by Mana Canvas, who held the original 1992 and 1993 copyrights, and Engine Room Records, who held the 2016 re-release rights, followed the next morning by a formal cease-and-desist order that forced his campaign to scrub the audio.

Right then, the multi-line console on her desk chirped once on Line One. In ninety-nine out of a hundred suites in the Dirksen Senate Office Building, a United States Senator never touched the main office telephone; a front-office bank of staff assistants and interns screened every incoming call before routing messages to the legislative staff. In Katie's literal autistic mind, however, the rule had never changed since her days as a Virginia Beach City Councilwoman, a Virginia State Delegate, and a Virginia State Senator: this was her office, her name was on the door, and whenever she was sitting at her desk with a free hand, it was only polite to answer the phone herself so the caller knew she was actually there working for the people of Virginia.

Reaching over from her SwiftChair before Sarah could even step toward the console, Katie pressed the button and said clearly, "Senator Katie Prairie's office, this is Katie speaking."

"Katie, it's Clara—I love that you still answer your own phone even in the United States Senate," the voice of Speaker of the House Clara Morales came through the line from the other side of the Capitol Rotunda. "The House Judiciary and Armed Services investigative committees have just completed their final subpoena report on Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson, Vice President Conrad Drayton, and President Thorne. We are voting on the Articles of Impeachment next week."

"Thank you for letting me know directly, Madam Speaker," Katie answered warmly, ending the call and nudging her joystick as she looked over at her legislative director. "What time is the floor roll call on Thorne's transportation nominee, Sarah?"

"Eleven-fifteen," Sarah answered, smiling as she held the office door open for our two wheelchairs.

"Good," Katie said, steering her SwiftChair out into the marble corridor of Dirksen with me rolling in lockstep beside her left wheel toward the Capitol subway. "Then at eleven-fifteen, President Thorne gets my No vote on his nominee—and as soon as Chief Justice Jonathan Sterling swears in the Senate for their trials, all three of them get my Guilty vote too."

The 2025 Warning from Richmond & Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson's Norfolk Carrier Leak

As our subway car glided through the subterranean tunnel between the Dirksen building and the Capitol, both Katie and I thought back two years earlier to January of 2025.

Back in that winter of 2025, Katie had still been serving as a State Senator in the Senate of Virginia in Richmond—living with me at Apartment 104 of the Broad & Boulevard Lofts on West Broad Street—when newly inaugurated President Garrett Thorne, backed by a Republican trifecta controlling the White House, the House of Representatives, and a fifty-three-to-forty-seven Senate majority, nominated Bret Halverson to serve as United States Secretary of Defense.

Before Thorne plucked him off television to run the Pentagon, Halverson had spent a decade hosting Patriot Watch Weekend on the Liberty First Network—a slick, hair-sprayed weekend cable talk show where he ranted about "woke generals," mocked disabled service members and ADA wheelchair accessibility standards as "weakness," and hawked survivalist supplements and gold coins during commercial breaks. In 2024, Halverson had gone on the Liberty First Network and sneered that military bases shouldn't waste taxpayer money on "wheelchair ramps for bureaucrats."

For anyone representing Hampton Roads—home to Naval Station Norfolk, the largest naval base on earth, alongside Naval Air Station Oceana, Joint Expeditionary Base Little Creek, Newport News Shipbuilding, and tens of thousands of active-duty sailors and military families—putting a cable television talk-show host in charge of three million service members and an eight-hundred-and-fifty-billion-dollar defense budget was an insult to every sailor in uniform.

Because Katie was still a State Senator in Richmond in January 2025 and hadn't yet run for the United States Senate, she didn't have a confirmation vote in Washington. Instead, she and I had stayed up past midnight in our West Broad Street apartment compiling a fourteen-page forensic dossier on Halverson's financial conflicts and erratic record. The next morning, State Senator Katie Prairie had rolled to the well of the Senate of Virginia in Richmond, publicly urged both of Virginia's United States Senators to vote No on Halverson's confirmation, and sent our dossier straight up Interstate 95 to Capitol Hill.

Virginia's retiring senior U.S. Senator had read Katie's letter into the Congressional Record and voted No alongside Virginia's other Senator, just as she had urged. Yet because Thorne's party controlled the chamber in January 2025, the majority conference had rammed Halverson's confirmation through on a razor-thin fifty-fifty tie broken by Vice President Conrad Drayton. That weekend, Secretary Halverson had gone back on his old cable network for a victory lap, laughing with his former co-hosts about "that little wheelchair state senator down in Richmond who thought she could stop the Pentagon."

It hadn't taken two years for every single warning Katie had issued from Richmond to come true. Back on December first during the lame-duck session—after escaping an outgoing Kentucky congressman's eight privileged impeachment articles by seven votes on a two-hundred-and-eleven-to-two-hundred-and-four motion to bury the resolution in committee—Halverson had marched up to the Pentagon briefing room podium to declare "total victory," sneering that the impeachment push was a "circus" and convincing himself he was untouchable. Instead, when the November 2026 midterm wave's new two-hundred-and-fifty-three-seat Democratic House majority and fifty-four-seat Senate majority convened with full subpoena power in January 2027 alongside United States Senator Katie Prairie of Virginia, Halverson's holiday hubris blew straight up in his face.

Within sixty days of the One Hundred Twentieth Congress taking power in January 2027, joint House and Senate subpoenas uncovered a staggering dual crime at the top of the administration:

First, Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson had used an unsecured commercial messaging app on his personal cell phone—on a group chat that included Vice President Conrad Drayton, two of Halverson's old cable-news producers, and a foreign-linked shipping broker—to text classified Fifth Fleet deployment schedules and transit coordinates for an aircraft carrier strike group homeported right at Naval Station Norfolk, putting six thousand Hampton Roads sailors in mortal danger.

Second, when I wrote a custom PHP financial cross-indexing script in Dirksen Room 511 to audit the subpoenaed Pentagon logistics ledgers against Treasury wire records, the data proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that Halverson had fired the Department of Defense Inspector General to cover up four hundred million dollars in no-bid Naval Station Norfolk fleet-supply contracts steered to an offshore shell fund co-owned by Thorne Global Holdings—using Domestic Emoluments and national-security tariff waivers personally signed by both Vice President Conrad Drayton and President Garrett Thorne.

Thursday Afternoon, March 25, 2027 — Why the Vice President Must Be Convicted Before the President

One week later, on Thursday afternoon, March 25, 2027—minutes after the United States House of Representatives voted two hundred and sixty-eight to one hundred and sixty-seven to impeach Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson, Vice President Conrad Drayton, and President Garrett Thorne for high crimes and misdemeanors—Speaker of the House Clara Morales and the House impeachment managers met with Katie and the Senate leadership inside the Capitol while I sat beside Katie's wheelchair with our constitutional succession timeline open on my laptop.

"Alexander Hamilton wrote in Federalist Number 65 that impeachment is designed for those offenses which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust," Katie said evenly around the conference table. "And Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. reminded this country that the time is always right to do what is right. All three of these men betrayed the sailors of Naval Station Norfolk and sold out the public trust for four hundred million dollars in offshore kickbacks. None of them—not Thorne, not Drayton, and not Halverson—can be allowed to remain in power."

"Which brings us to the exact sequence of the three Senate trials," Speaker Clara Morales said, looking across the table at Katie and Senate Majority Leader Charles Schuman. "Because under Article II, Section 1, Clause 6 of the Constitution and Section 1 of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, the order in which the Senate calls the final roll determines who becomes President of the United States."

Katie nodded, tapping the statutory flow chart I had coded on my screen.

"If the Senate convicts and removes President Garrett Thorne first," Katie explained with crystal-clear constitutional precision, "then the exact microsecond Chief Justice Sterling bangs his gavel on the sixty-seventh Guilty vote, Vice President Conrad Drayton—the man who broke the tie to put Bret Halverson in the Pentagon and co-signed the offshore Norfolk contract waivers—automatically ascends to the Presidency. Even if we impeached him the next day, he would already be sitting in the Oval Office with the pardon pen in his hand."

"Whereas if we try and convict them in ascending order of their conspiracy," I added from my chair beside Katie, pointing to the three numbered boxes on my screen, "watch what the Constitution and the United States Code do automatically:

"First, on Wednesday, the Senate votes on Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson—convicting and removing him by a two-thirds supermajority under Article I, Section 3, followed immediately by the simple-majority vote permanently disqualifying him from ever holding federal office again.

"Second, on Thursday, while Garrett Thorne is still President, the Senate votes on Vice President Conrad Drayton. The moment sixty-seven Senators vote Guilty to convict and remove Conrad Drayton, the office of Vice President of the United States becomes completely vacant. Under Section 2 of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment, a replacement Vice President cannot take office unless confirmed by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress—meaning our majorities in the House and the Senate simply decline to consider any nominee, keeping the Vice Presidency empty overnight.

"And third, on Friday afternoon, with the Vice Presidency vacant, the Senate votes to convict, remove, and permanently disqualify President Garrett Thorne. Under the Presidential Succession Act of 1947—Title 3, Section 19 of the United States Code—with both the Presidency and the Vice Presidency vacant at the same time, the line of succession skips straight across the Capitol Rotunda to the Speaker of the House."

Across the mahogany table, Speaker Clara Morales looked at the forty-one-year-old Senator from Virginia Beach and her twin brother in quiet awe.

"Wednesday for Halverson, Thursday for Drayton, and Friday for Thorne," Majority Leader Schuman said, writing the three dates onto the official Senate trial calendar. "And Senator Prairie—because Naval Station Norfolk is your home turf, we want you delivering the final floor speech before the roll is called."

Part 2: Route 36 to Timberline Shopping Center, Lunch at Don Miller Subs, Retro Games at Neat Stuff, & Suite 756

Date: 2027-04-03 at 12:05 America/New_York

Saturday, April 3, 2027, 12:05 PM — Riding CVTA Route 36 to Timberline Shopping Center & Family Lunch at Don Miller Subs

"Approaching State Route four-ten, Holland Road and Timberlake Road—Timberline Shopping Center," the automated chime announced over the interior speakers of our forty-foot Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Route 36 bus as the driver signaled right and eased into the curb lane just east of where State Route 225 split off toward South Independence Boulevard and the Silverleaf commuter lot.

Up near the front wheel well, my twin brother Nate reached up from his compact SwiftChair and pressed the yellow request-to-stop strip along the wall, while our sixty-eight-year-old dad stood up from the forward-facing bench seat across the aisle and tucked his sunglasses into the breast pocket of his polo shirt.

Unlike the part-time Virginia General Assembly up in Richmond—which met for forty-five or sixty winter days and then sent us home for the rest of the year—the United States Senate stayed in session almost year-round from January 3rd right up to Christmas. Even so, the Senate's weekly floor voting calendar almost always wrapped up around two o'clock on Thursday afternoon, allowing Nate, Dad, and me to catch the afternoon ARTS Northeast Regional train south from Alexandria to Norfolk and spend every Friday, Saturday, and Sunday at home in Kempsville. Better yet, this first full week of April fell during the Senate's scheduled Spring State Work Period, giving the House impeachment managers and the White House defense counsel ten days to file their pre-trial briefs before the Senate impeachment trials of Secretary of Defense Bret Halverson, Vice President Conrad Drayton, and President Garrett Thorne gaveled in on Wednesday, April 14th.

"Have a great Saturday, Senator Prairie, Nate, Mr. Prairie!" the CVTA driver called out warmly as he kneeled the front air suspension, flipped the hydraulic fold-out ramp onto the concrete sidewalk of Holland Road, and waved as all three of us—having tapped our regular fare cards when we boarded—thanked him and rolled out into the bright sixty-eight-degree April sunshine.

Across the six lanes of State Route 410 on the south side of the highway stood Holland Square, anchored by the green signage of the Market Square grocery store. Here on the north side of Holland Road, however, we had just rolled into the parking lot of Timberline Shopping Center—a weathered, familiar 1980s neighborhood strip center anchored at its far end by a General Dollar discount store.

For Nate, Dad, and me, Timberline Shopping Center was one of our favorite Saturday afternoon stops along the Route 36 bus line between Buckner Boulevard and the Silverleaf transfer hub—and today was a special occasion. In five days, on Thursday, April 8th, Nate and I would turn forty-two years old. Every spring on the Saturday before our April 8th birthday, Dad rode the bus with us to Timberline Shopping Center to treat us to our traditional birthday lunch at Don Miller Subs and buy us a pair of vintage video game cartridges next door at Neat Stuff.

Steering our two SwiftChairs side by side along the covered concrete walkway toward the far-left bay of the five-storefront row, we rolled straight through the propped-open glass door of Don Miller Subs, where the warm, savory aroma of grilled ribeye steak, caramelized onions, and freshly baked sub rolls greeted us like an old friend.

"Well, look who's back from Washington—and happy early birthday to the April eighth twins!" Marcus, the counter manager who had been grilling subs for the three of us since my years in the Virginia House of Delegates, beamed from behind the stainless-steel prep line. "The birthday usual for the Prairie crew? Two six-inch grilled steak-and-cheese subs with everything, one turkey-and-provolone, a large basket of hot french fries to share, and three tall cups of ginger ale?"

"You know us by heart, Marcus—and the birthday lunch is on Dad today," Dad laughed, stepping up to the register to tap his debit card before I could reach for my wallet.

For the next thirty-five minutes, sitting at our usual accessible corner table where Nate and I could pull our wheelchairs right up to the laminate top without blocking the aisle, the three of us ate piping-hot subs and crispy french fries out of wax-paper baskets and clinked our three plastic cups of ice-cold ginger ale together in an early forty-second birthday toast. Nobody in the sub shop bothered us for speeches or talking points; a retired Navy chief at the next booth simply nodded with a quiet "Proud of you up there on Capitol Hill, Senator," before letting us enjoy our Saturday lunch in peace.

Saturday, April 3, 2027, 12:50 PM — Hunting for Forty-Second Birthday Retro Cartridges at Neat Stuff in Suite 732

At ten minutes to one, after wiping our hands with napkins and tossing our paper baskets into the trash bin by the door, we rolled out of Don Miller Subs and turned one door to the right into Suite 732: Neat Stuff.

While everyone in Hampton Roads knew Pixel Haven as our region's premier retro and modern video game store, Neat Stuff here in Suite 732 of Timberline Shopping Center was Pixel Haven's sister store—a floor-to-ceiling treasure cavern packed with vintage console cartridges, classic handheld games, eight-bit and sixteen-bit hardware, comic books, and retro sci-fi collectibles. Ever since we were kids playing our Super Kinoka and Nova 64 consoles in our bedroom on Delaney Street—and trading PlayBrick cartridges in the back of Dad's car—Nate and I had never outgrown our love for retro video games.

"Katie! Nate! Mr. Prairie—happy early birthday!" Devon, the bearded thirty-something clerk behind the glass cartridge counter, lit up the moment our two SwiftChairs rolled down the wide center aisle between the glass display cases. "You three picked the exact right Saturday to ride the 36 over here. Hold on—I put two cartridges in the lockbox under the register yesterday afternoon because I knew Mr. Prairie would be bringing you two in for your April eighth birthday!"

Devon unlocked the sliding glass door at the back of the counter and set two pristine, gray plastic cartridges on the felt mat in front of our wheelchairs: an original 1994 Gorilla King '94 cartridge for the PlayBrick with an unblemished holographic label, and a complete-in-box sixteen-bit Super Kinoka strategy role-playing game we had been hunting for since 2024.

Nate's blue eyes lit up like he was twelve years old again. Picking up the sixteen-bit cartridge, he tilted the bottom edge toward the overhead fluorescent light to inspect the gold copper contact pins.

"Look at the board pins, Katie—not a single trace of oxidation, and the battery-backed save chip was just soldered fresh," Nate said happily, handing me the cardboard box so I could admire the manual. "We can dump the ROM onto our local emulator in Bedroom 4 to preserve the save states and play the original cartridge on the CRT television in the living room tonight."

"Happy forty-second birthday, you two," Dad smiled, stepping up to the counter to pay for both games while Devon slipped them into a sturdy paper bag and hung the handles over my right armrest.

Saturday, April 3, 2027, 1:15 PM — The Banners at Suite 756 & Senatorial Curiosity

Rolling back out of Suite 732 onto the covered concrete sidewalk of Timberline Shopping Center with our paper bag of retro games tucked beside my armrest, Nate, Dad, and I turned right along the storefront walkway toward the Route 36 bus stop out on Holland Road.

For years, the five-bay strip along this end of Timberline Shopping Center had followed the exact same left-to-right rhythm: Don Miller Subs on the left, Neat Stuff in Suite 732, the quiet pink neon sign of Halo Nails & Spa in the middle, the busy tables of Pho 79 Vietnamese Kitchen in the fourth bay, and then Suite 756 on the far right—a narrow eleven-hundred-square-foot storefront that had sat completely empty behind dusty brown butcher paper since the spring of 2023.

As we rolled past Halo Nails & Spa and reached the front windows of Pho 79 Vietnamese Kitchen—where the rich, mouthwatering scent of simmering star anise, charred ginger, cinnamon bark, and slow-cooked beef pho broth drifted out through the exhaust vent into the April air—all three of us stopped in our tracks.

Suite 756 right next door to the Vietnamese restaurant wasn't empty anymore.

Every square inch of its plate-glass facade had been plastered floor-to-ceiling with glaring crimson, white, and gold vinyl banners that read:

THE TIDEWATER THORNE & RTR SUPERSTORE — OFFICIAL RESTORE THE REPUBLIC CAMPAIGN HEADQUARTERS!

Behind the glass stood a six-foot cardboard cutout of President Garrett Thorne giving a grinning double thumbs-up, flanked by neon-red posters reading THORNE: 3-0 UNDEFEATED — IMPEACH THIS! and THORNE 2028: THE REVENGE TOUR!

"Good grief," Dad muttered, staring at the giant vinyl banner taped right up against the brick pillar separating Suite 756 from Pho 79. "An 'America First' Garrett Thorne shrine sharing a party wall with a Vietnamese pho restaurant. You couldn't make that up if you tried."

Sitting in my SwiftChair on the sidewalk twenty feet from the door of Suite 756, I frowned thoughtfully at the words OFFICIAL RESTORE THE REPUBLIC CAMPAIGN HEADQUARTERS printed across the banner.

Over the past six weeks, our constituent caseworkers in Virginia Beach and Norfolk —along with my colleagues on the Senate Commerce Committee's Consumer Protection Subcommittee—had fielded dozens of inquiries about a sudden rash of brick-and-mortar "Thorne Stores" popping up in strip malls across Virginia. Every constituent who called our office believed the exact same rumor: that these storefronts were officially vetted, licensed, and authorized by President Garrett Thorne, Thorne Global Holdings, or his national campaign committee, and that buying forty-dollar hats and sixty-dollar flags inside them went directly to fund the President's impeachment defense.

Neither Nate, nor Dad, nor I had any idea who had leased Suite 756. As far as we knew, it was just another out-of-state novelty vendor looking to make a quick buck off Holland Road traffic before the next Route 36 bus arrived at one-thirty-five.

Curiosity got the better of the Senator in me.

“Wait a second, Nate, Dad,” I said, resting my right hand on my joystick. “We still have twenty minutes before the one-thirty-five bus pulls up. People keep asking our Commerce Committee staff whether these ‘Thorne Superstores’ are actually vetted and licensed by Garrett Thorne, his company, or his campaign—or if they’re unlicensed bootleggers tricking voters into thinking retail purchases are campaign contributions. Let’s roll inside for sixty seconds and look at the merchandise tags and the business license by the register.”

“Sixty seconds of consumer protection fieldwork,” Nate agreed, glancing at his watch with a dry smile. “Lead the way, Senator.”

Saturday, April 3, 2027, 1:18 PM — Inside Suite 756: Sharron Connects the Dots & Twenty-Four Years of Truth

When Dad pulled open the aluminum-framed glass door of Suite 756 and held it for Nate and me to roll our two SwiftChairs across the threshold, a cheap brass bell taped above the door frame jangled loudly.

The first thing that hit us inside the narrow storefront was the sensory clash: the sharp chemical smell of fresh overseas vinyl ink mixing with the unmistakable, delicious aroma of Vietnamese beef pho broth and star anise seeping straight through the thin drywall partition from Pho 79 next door.

Every wall was covered in pegboard hooks and wire racks overflowing with crimson Restore the Republic baseball caps, polyester three-by-five flags showing Garrett Thorne’s head superimposed onto a bodybuilder holding an eagle, gold-foil novelty “One Thousand Dollar Thorne Notes,” and freshly unpacked shipping cartons stenciled THORNE: 3-0 UNDEFEATED — ACQUITTED IN THE SENATE!

Up at the glass checkout counter near the back wall—where a small tabletop television was tuned to a shouting panel on LibertyMax—an older husband and wife in matching red RTR windbreakers were handing a crisp hundred-dollar bill across the counter, while three sixty-something women wearing crimson Restore the Republic lapel pins stood near the back flag rack sipping iced coffees and browsing the shelves.

“We drove over from Kempsville as soon as we saw the sign on Holland Road,” the husband was saying earnestly to the woman behind the cash register, whose back was half-turned as she priced a box of white ceramic THORNE 2028 coffee mugs with a handheld sticker gun. “We bought two flags and two of the ‘3-0 Undefeated’ hats because we want every dollar going straight to President Thorne’s Senate trial defense fund!”

“Oh, bless your hearts, patriots—President Thorne appreciates every single bit of your support, and those Senate Democrats don’t stand a prayer of getting sixty-seven votes next week!” the woman behind the register replied in a syrupy, familiar voice, never once correcting the couple’s false belief that her store was connected to the President’s defense fund.

While the couple zipped their new hats into a plastic shopping bag and walked past us out the front door, I reached out from my wheelchair and flipped over the neck tag of a THORNE: 3-0 UNDEFEATED t-shirt hanging on the nearest circular rack.

“Look at the collar tag, Nate,” I murmured quietly. “Manufactured in Guangdong Province for Wholesale Novelty Imports LLC. Zero union bug, zero Federal Election Commission disclaimer, and zero licensing mark from Thorne Global Holdings.”

Nate rolled his SwiftChair three feet closer to the glass checkout counter and pointed past a large plastic jar of five-dollar buttons that had been deliberately positioned at the corner of the register to block the counter mat. Taped flat beneath the jar in tiny eight-point font was a two-sentence notice:

Privately owned and operated retail establishment. Not authorized by, vetted by, licensed by, or affiliated with Garrett Thorne, Thorne Global Holdings, or any candidate or political committee.

“Every dime goes straight into the store owner’s pocket,” Nate said softly, his eyes lifting from the hidden disclaimer to the framed City of Virginia Beach Commissioner of the Revenue Business License hanging on the pegboard wall behind the cash register.

I followed my brother’s gaze up to the typed name on the municipal business license.

PROPRIETOR: BRENDA WALSH.

Across the narrow aisle beside my right wheel, I heard Dad draw in a sharp, silent breath.

Behind the counter, the sixty-five-year-old woman with dyed blonde hair finished sticking a twenty-four-ninety-nine price tag onto the bottom of a THORNE 2028 mug, set her pricing gun down on the glass, and turned around with a practiced retail smile on her face.

“Welcome to the Tidewater Thorne Superstore!” she began brightly. “Everything in the store goes to—”

Her voice died in her throat.

The ceramic coffee mug slipped halfway out of her fingers and clattered upright onto the glass countertop.

Standing—and sitting—six feet in front of her cash register were her ex-husband David Prairie, her forty-one-year-old son Nathaniel Prairie, and her forty-one-year-old daughter, United States Senator Katie Prairie.

None of the three of us had laid eyes on our mother since the afternoon of Saturday, July 12, 2003—twenty-four years ago—when eighteen-year-old Nate and I had rolled our wheelchairs out the front door of the brick house on Delaney Street with Dad to move into Greenway Court Apartment A6.

For five full seconds, the only sound inside Suite 756 was the drone of the LibertyMax anchor on the corner television and the muffled clatter of soup spoons coming through the drywall from Pho 79 next door.

Brenda's face drained to chalk white, and then flushed a deep, blotchy crimson from her collar up to her roots. Her eyes darted in sheer panic toward the three women from her Restore the Republic chapter standing ten feet away by the back flag rack.

"What—what are you three doing in here?!" Brenda hissed, her voice dropping from its syrupy customer-service lilt to the sharp, defensive snap Nate and I still remembered from the hallways of our childhood. "Are you following me?! Did David tell you to come in here to harass me?!"

"Nobody knew you worked here, Brenda," Dad said, his voice completely calm, level, and devoid of anger as he stood with one hand resting steadily on the back push-handle of my wheelchair and the other near Nate's shoulder. "Your children turn forty-two on Thursday, April eighth. Just like we've done every spring for the past fifteen years, I rode the Route 36 bus over here with Katie and Nate to buy them their birthday lunch at Don Miller Subs and their birthday video games at Neat Stuff three doors down. We didn't even know Suite 756 had been leased until we rolled out onto the sidewalk two minutes ago."

At the mention of April 8th, Brenda's eyes flickered toward the wall calendar hanging beside her cash register—making it unmistakably clear that until Dad said the date out loud, the woman who had given birth to us forty-two years ago hadn't even remembered that our birthday was five days away.

Before Brenda could utter another word, one of the three women standing by the flag rack stepped forward into the center aisle, lowering her iced coffee cup as she stared in stunned recognition at Dad, then at Nate, and then at me.

It was Sharron—a former neighbor from two streets over in our old Kempsville subdivision who had known our family back in the nineties when Nate and I were growing up on Delaney Street, long before our neuromuscular diagnosis in 2001.

"David?!" Sharron gasped, her eyes widening as she looked from Dad's silver hair down to our two wheelchairs, and then straight across the counter at Brenda. "David Prairie?! Wait a minute… Katie and Nathaniel Prairie! I remember watching you two ride your bikes down Delaney Street when you were kids!"

Sharron spun around toward Brenda, her voice echoing across the narrow storefront as the other two Restore the Republic women—Donna and Carol—froze beside her.

"Brenda, wait a second!" Sharron demanded, pointing from the framed Brenda Walsh business license on the wall to my wheelchair. "When you joined our Restore the Republic chapter under the name Brenda Walsh, you told us you didn't even know the Prairie family! For two straight years you've sat at our kitchen tables trashing ‘that Prairie woman’ on television like she was a total stranger! Wait—your daughter is our United States Senator?! And their birthdays are coming up on Thursday, and you didn’t even remember?! Brenda, it’s time for you to come clean!”

Beside Sharron, Donna and Carol stared at Brenda as if the floor had just opened beneath their feet.

“What is she talking about, Brenda?!” Donna asked, her voice rising in disbelief. “United States Senator Katie Prairie is your biological daughter?! You looked us dead in the eye at church coffee hour on Tuesday and swore you weren’t related to her!”

Behind the glass counter, Brenda’s hands trembled violently as her carefully constructed double life collapsed in front of her own friends.

“I—I went back to my maiden name Walsh because David and the woke universities brainwashed them against their own mother!” Brenda stammered, her face turning a blotchy, furious purple as she tried to fall back on the talking points that usually worked in her chapter meetings. “They turned their backs on me and became godless Washington liberals!”

Sharron didn’t buy a single word of it. She took a step closer to the counter, her face tightening with maternal disgust as she did the math out loud in front of Donna and Carol.

“Woke universities?!” Sharron shot back. “Brenda, I lived two streets over from you on Delaney Street in two thousand and one! Katie and Nathaniel weren’t at a university when you and David divorced—they were sixteen years old at Northwood High School, right after the doctors diagnosed their muscle condition and put both of them in wheelchairs! Every mother in the neighborhood heard how you threw a fit because you were embarrassed to be seen pushing wheelchairs in public!”

Beside my left wheel, Nate’s voice was quiet, steady, and devastatingly clear.

“Dad didn’t turn us against you, Brenda,” Nate said, looking straight across the counter. “You did that yourself in August of 2001 when we were sixteen years old and our legs were failing—when you maxed out the credit card to drag us onto a cruise ship against our will, screamed at us that we were ruining your vacation because we couldn’t walk up the gangway, and tried to force two high school juniors into a toddler character meet-and-greet line so you could take a fake photo for the neighbors. And when the doctors put us in wheelchairs that September, Dad built ramps and carried us up the stairs, while you locked yourself in the kitchen with a bottle of gin.”

“And the reason your name is Brenda Walsh on that business license behind you,” Dad added calmly, “is because in October of 2001, sixteen-year-old Katie and Nate asked me and my attorney to make restoring your maiden name a condition of paying off your cruise debt in the divorce decree—because neither of your children wanted you carrying the Prairie name ever again.”

Sitting in my SwiftChair with Dad’s forty-second-birthday gift bag from Neat Stuff hanging beside my armrest, I looked from the six-foot cardboard cutout of Garrett Thorne grinning beside the register to Brenda, and then to Sharron, Donna, and Carol.

“Sixteen days ago, on the morning of March eighteenth,” I said evenly, “the man on that cardboard cutout stood on the South Lawn of the White House on live national television and called me a ‘nasty, bitter little cripple,’ said I was ‘slow’ and had ‘no stamina,’ called us ‘defective,’ and mocked your son Nate as my ‘crippled twin brother.’ Not only did you build a shrine to the man who hurled derogatory slurs at your own children’s wheelchairs on national television, Brenda—you’re also deceiving your own friends and customers right here in Suite 756.”

I pointed past the plastic jar of five-dollar buttons on the counter to the hidden eight-point disclaimer taped flat against the glass.

“Constituents have been calling my Senate Commerce Committee office all month asking if the rumors are true that these ‘Thorne Superstores’—or the local Restore the Republic chapters—are officially vetted, endorsed, and licensed by Garrett Thorne, his company, or his campaign,” I said, looking directly at Sharron, Donna, and Carol. “Look behind that button jar on the counter, ladies, and look at the Guangdong wholesale tags inside the collars. Just like the local chapters, this store has zero authorization or endorsement from Garrett Thorne or his campaign. When that couple from Kempsville just handed Brenda a hundred dollars thinking it was going to the President’s Senate trial defense fund, every single dime went straight into Brenda’s personal bank account.”

Donna and Carol stepped up to the glass counter, peered behind the button jar at the tiny eight-point disclaimer, and looked from Brenda’s blotchy face to the grinning cardboard cutout of Garrett Thorne.

As mothers and grandmothers themselves, the three women looked at what Brenda had done to make her own two children cut her off—forcing two sixteen-year-old teenagers with failing legs onto a cruise ship, screaming at them when they couldn’t walk, retreating to a bottle of gin when they went into wheelchairs, forgetting their forty-second birthday, and then cheering on a man who mocked her own son and daughter on national television while she fleeced her own chapter friends behind a button jar.

In that quiet strip-mall storefront, the entire illusion of the movement they had been pouring their lives into shattered at once.

Sharron stared at the cardboard cutout of Garrett Thorne, and then looked straight across the counter at Brenda in horror.

“Wait—we worshipped a man who has said derogatory things about your own daughter?!” Sharron said, her voice trembling with maternal outrage. “Calling her a cripple, and slow, and saying she has no stamina?! No, Brenda, we can’t support this anymore!”

Sharron set the two flags and the coffee mug she had been holding flat down onto the glass counter with a sharp thud—and then reached up to the collar of her cardigan, unpinned her gold-bordered crimson Restore the Republic — Chapter President badge, and dropped it onto the glass right in front of Brenda.

“I started our Virginia Beach Restore the Republic chapter three years ago—and just like your phony store, Brenda, President Thorne never endorsed or cared about a single one of us either,” Sharron said, her voice shaking with disgust. “I am a mother and a grandmother. Hearing what you did to your own sixteen-year-old twins when they went into wheelchairs—and watching you stand here worshipping a man who calls your own daughter a cripple and slow on national television while you use our members as your personal piggy bank—makes me sick to my stomach."

Beside her, Donna and Carol reached up to their own lapels, unpinned their crimson Restore the Republic pins, and dropped them onto the glass countertop with two sharp metallic clicks.

"We're done with you, Brenda, and we're done with Restore the Republic," Donna said firmly.

"I'm shutting the chapter down tonight," Sharron told Brenda flatly, before turning around in the narrow aisle with Donna and Carol to face Dad, Nate, and me. All three women had tears shining in their eyes.

"David… Katie… Nathaniel," Sharron said softly, her voice thick with genuine remorse as she looked down at our two wheelchairs. "We owe the three of you an apology. We bought into ugly lies on television about a family we should have been proud of all along. What your father did for you two—and what the two of you have built with your lives after what she put you through—is extraordinary."

"We're so sorry, Senator Prairie," Carol said, wiping her cheek with the back of her hand. "Every single one of us—and our husbands—are voting Democrat in the next election, and you have our votes for as long as you run."

"And happy forty-second birthday on Thursday, Katie and Nathaniel," Donna added warmly as the three women stepped to the front door and held it open for us.

"Thank you, Sharron. Thank you, Donna, Carol," I said, genuinely touched as Nate and Dad nodded warmly to all three of them.

Behind the glass counter, Brenda stood frozen in total, trembling silence—abandoned by the family she had mistreated twenty-six years ago and just walked out on by the friends and movement she had traded us for—inside an empty storefront that smelled of cheap vinyl ink and Pho 79's simmering beef broth.

Out on Holland Road beyond the plate-glass window, the amber LED destination sign of the one-thirty-five CVTA Route 36 bus glided into view as it approached the Timberline Shopping Center stop—a bus route that only ran on Saturday afternoons because Nate, Dad, and I had fought to save and expand it sixteen years ago when I first took my seat on the Virginia Beach City Council.

I glanced once more at the stacks of newly delivered cardboard shipping cartons piled behind Brenda's register—every single box stenciled THORNE: 3-0 UNDEFEATED and THORNE 2028.

"Goodbye, Brenda," I said quietly, turning my SwiftChair smoothly in the narrow aisle alongside Nate's chair as Dad walked beside us toward the open doorway. "And as your United States Senator—I hope you kept the wholesale receipts for those '3-0 Undefeated' and '2028' boxes before the Senate reconvenes on April fourteenth."

The cheap brass bell above the door jangled once more behind us as Nate, Dad, and I rolled out of Suite 756 into the warm, clean Virginia Beach sunshine—waving goodbye to Sharron, Donna, and Carol on the sidewalk while the Route 36 bus kneeled at the curb to take the three of us home to Kempsville.

Part 3: The Words of Mason, Madison, and Lincoln, Three Guilty Votes, & From Capitol Police Protection Back to Normal Life at Pleasure House Road

Date: 2027-07-17 at 13:30 America/New_York

Wednesday & Thursday, April 14–15, 2027 — Convicting Secretary Halverson and Vice President Drayton

Two years earlier, in January of 2025, I had been sitting at my desk in the Senate of Virginia in Richmond when President Garrett Thorne nominated Bret Halverson—the slick, hair-sprayed weekend host of Patriot Watch Weekend on the Liberty First Network—to serve as United States Secretary of Defense, and when Vice President Conrad Drayton cast the tie-breaking fiftieth vote to put him in charge of the Pentagon over the objections of every military family in Hampton Roads.

That weekend in 2025, Halverson had gone back on his old cable network for a victory lap, laughing with his former co-hosts about "that little wheelchair state senator down in Richmond who thought she could stop the Pentagon."

He wasn't laughing anymore.

On Wednesday afternoon, April 14, 2027, Bret Halverson sat pale and sweating at the respondent's table in the well of the United States Senate Chamber while Chief Justice Jonathan Sterling presided from the marble rostrum and the Reading Clerk called the final roll on Article One and Article Two of his impeachment.

Up on the top tier of the Senate Floor beside the accessible upper doorway, I sat alone at my custom-height mahogany Senator's desk in my compact SwiftChair with my electromagnetic drive brakes locked firm and my red-tabbed impeachment evidence binder resting flat across my lap. Because Senate rules strictly limit the chamber floor during an impeachment trial to sworn United States Senators and officers of the court, my twin brother Nate sat in his matching SwiftChair beside our dad at the brass railing of the Senate Family Gallery directly across the chamber, his blue eyes locked steadily on mine.

Down in the well, Halverson's defense attorneys didn't even look up toward my desk. After the House managers had displayed the screenshots of Halverson texting classified Naval Station Norfolk carrier strike group deployment schedules over a commercial phone app alongside the four-hundred-million-dollar Thorne Global Holdings kickback ledger Nate's scripts had uncovered, seventeen institutional Republican Senators from defense and coastal states had announced they were crossing the aisle.

"Mr. Mendoza," the Reading Clerk called out.

"Guilty," Senator Mendoza answered from across the aisle.

The clerk's eyes moved down the alphabetical tally sheet and looked up toward my mahogany desk at the top of the chamber.

"Ms. Prairie."

For half a second, the entire Senate Chamber went dead silent. Down at the respondent's table, Bret Halverson finally raised his head, looking up the tiered steps of the chamber straight at the wheelchair he had mocked on national television two years ago.

I didn't raise my voice, and I didn't take my hands off my armrests. Looking straight down into the well on behalf of every sailor at Naval Station Norfolk whose operational safety he had treated like a cable-news segment, I gave him the vote I had promised from Richmond in 2025.

"Guilty," I said clearly across the quiet chamber.

By a vote of seventy-one to twenty-nine—four votes above the two-thirds constitutional threshold required under Article I, Section 3 of the Constitution—the Senate convicted and removed Bret Halverson from office, followed ten minutes later by a simple-majority vote permanently disqualifying him from ever holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States again.

Twenty-four hours later, on Thursday afternoon, April 15, 2027, the second domino fell.

Confronted with the unredacted Treasury wire tables proving that Vice President Conrad Drayton had personally co-signed the offshore routing waivers for the Naval Station Norfolk logistics kickbacks and sat on the exact same unsecured messaging thread while our Fifth Fleet sailors' movements were compromised, sixty-eight Senators—including me—voted Guilty at four-thirty on Thursday afternoon to convict and remove Conrad Drayton from the Vice Presidency, followed immediately by a second vote permanently disqualifying him from future federal office.

With the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives and our fifty-four-seat majority in the Senate refusing to entertain any Twenty-Fifth Amendment replacement nominee from a disgraced White House, the office of Vice President of the United States stood completely vacant as Thursday night fell over Washington.

Friday, April 16, 2027, 1:30 PM — The Words of George Mason, James Madison, and Abraham Lincoln

At three o'clock on Friday morning—less than eleven hours before the final Senate deliberation and roll-call vote on the Articles of Impeachment against President Garrett Thorne—the President had gone online from the residence of the White House to unleash one final, desperate tirade against Nate and me.

In all-capital letters, Thorne had called me a "defective, bitter little cripple on wheels" and a "spinster who couldn't keep a man in her twenties and is trying to steal the Presidency from her wheelchair with her shut-in twin brother."

Even at the very end, Garrett Thorne still didn't understand that every ugly, ableist insult he hurled at my wheelchair and my brother only disgusted more institutional Senators in his own party and cemented the two-thirds coalition against him.

At one-thirty on Friday afternoon, April 16, 2027, inside the closed marble chamber of the United States Senate during the final hour of deliberations before the roll call, I engaged the drive lock on my SwiftChair beside my top-tier mahogany desk, pressed my microphone button, and rested my hands on the edge of my lectern as all ninety-nine of my fellow Senators turned toward my seat.

"Mr. Chief Justice, and my colleagues of the Senate," I said evenly across the silent chamber. "Two hundred and forty years ago, right down the road from where my brother Nate and I grew up in Virginia, George Mason stood at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia and warned that no man who holds the executive power should ever be placed above the reach of the law when he corrupts his office, asking the delegates: Shall any man be above justice? Above all, shall that man be above it, who can commit the most extensive injustice?"

Up in the Family Gallery above the marble columns, Dad rested his hand on Nate's shoulder as Nate looked down at me from his SwiftChair.

"And when another Virginian, James Madison, wrote Federalist Number 51," I continued, my voice calm and unhurried, "he didn't tell us to trust the personal goodwill of a President or a Cabinet Secretary. Madison wrote: If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself. Madison and the framers gave this Senate the sole power to try all impeachments specifically to guard the republic against men who treat a public trust as a private business."

I looked down into the well toward the respondent's table where President Garrett Thorne's defense lawyers sat staring down at their legal pads.

"Abraham Lincoln once said that nearly all men can stand adversity, but if you want to test a man's character, give him power—and at Gettysburg, he charged every generation of Americans to ensure that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth," I said. "We gave Garrett Thorne, Conrad Drayton, and Bret Halverson the highest powers under this Constitution. They used that power to trade tariff waivers and Naval Station Norfolk fleet contracts for four hundred million dollars in offshore kickbacks, to leak the movements of six thousand Virginia sailors on commercial phones, and to mock the disabled citizens they swore an oath to serve. Mason, Madison, and Lincoln left us an exact constitutional remedy for men who fail that test—and when the Clerk calls the roll, I will vote Guilty."

Friday, April 16, 2027, 2:15 PM — Sixty-Eight Guilty Votes, Permanent Disqualification, & President Clara Morales

At two o'clock, the gallery doors were unlocked to the public and the press corps, and Chief Justice Jonathan Sterling rose in his black judicial robe at the marble rostrum.

“The Secretary will call the roll on Article One of the Articles of Impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Garrett Thorne, President of the United States,” Chief Justice Sterling announced.

This was the third time in American history that the House of Representatives had impeached Garrett Thorne—and during his first two impeachments back in his first term, he had escaped removal only because the Senate tally had fallen short of the two-thirds constitutional wall.

This third time, the wall broke.

One by one, as the Reading Clerk called the alphabetical roll, fourteen Republican Senators who had voted to acquit Thorne in his earlier impeachment trials rose from their mahogany desks and answered “Guilty.”

“Mr. Mendoza,” the Reading Clerk called out.

“Guilty,” Senator Mendoza answered.

“Ms. Prairie.”

I kept my hands resting calmly on the armrests of my SwiftChair, my electromagnetic drive brakes locked tight against the blue Senate carpet. Twenty-one years after Brandon Mercer had switched off my powerchair outside the Williamsburg train station in the pouring November rain and told me I was powerless—and thirteen days after rolling into Suite 756 at Timberline Shopping Center on Holland Road and seeing the shrines and unopened crates of “3-0 UNDEFEATED” and “THORNE 2028” merchandise my own estranged mother had chosen over her children—I looked straight down into the well of the United States Senate.

“Guilty,” I said clearly.

Twenty minutes later, when the Reading Clerk handed the certified tally sheet up to the rostrum showing that sixty-eight Senators had voted Guilty on both Articles of Impeachment—exceeding the sixty-seven-vote two-thirds constitutional threshold required under Article I, Section 3—Chief Justice Sterling struck the marble rostrum once with his ivory gavel.

“The Senate having tried Garrett Thorne, President of the United States, upon two Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present having found him guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors,” Chief Justice Sterling declared across the hushed chamber, “it is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said Garrett Thorne be, and he is hereby, removed from office.”

Before the defense table could even close their briefcases, Senate Majority Leader Charles Schuman rose and moved the second resolution under Article I, Section 3, Clause 7: permanent disqualification from ever holding any federal office again, which under settled Senate precedent required only a simple majority of fifty-one votes. When the clerk called “Ms. Prairie” on the permanent disqualification roll call, I delivered my second vote of the hour just as evenly as the first:

“Aye.”

The disqualification resolution passed sixty-eight to thirty-two. With that gavel strike, Garrett Thorne, Conrad Drayton, and Bret Halverson were not only stripped of their offices—they were barred for the rest of their natural lives from ever putting their names on a federal ballot or holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States again.

Looking up across the marble columns at Nate in the Family Gallery as he smiled down at me from his SwiftChair, both of us were thinking the exact same thing: if Garrett Thorne had wanted Mana Canvas's The Grand Decree as his unauthorized 2024 theme song so badly before Mana Canvas and Engine Room Records hit his campaign with copyright claims and a cease-and-desist order, the Senate had just given him the broken-music-box reprise from the end of the Runebreaker soundtrack.

And because we had convicted and removed Vice President Conrad Drayton on Thursday afternoon and left the Vice Presidency vacant, the Presidential Succession Act of 1947—Title 3, Section 19 of the United States Code—took immediate constitutional effect.

Fifteen minutes after the Senate doors swung open, Nate and Dad took the elevator down from the Family Gallery and rolled down the marble corridor beside my wheelchair into the Mansfield Room just off the Senate Floor.

Standing beneath the crystal chandelier—having just signed her formal resignation as Speaker and Representative from the House—was Clara Morales, her left hand resting on a bound copy of the Constitution and her family Bible while she raised her right hand before Chief Justice Jonathan Sterling to take the constitutional oath of office as the new President of the United States.

Nate locked his SwiftChair brakes right alongside mine at the front of the room and reached across the two-inch gap between our armrests to squeeze my hand while Dad rested his hands proudly on our shoulders.

"Clean sweep, Senator," Nate whispered against my ear as the room erupted into applause for President Clara Morales. "All three of them gone for good."

"Every single one, Nate," I whispered back, squeezing my twin brother's hand just as tight.

Twenty minutes later, when Nate, Dad, and I rode the subway car back under Constitution Avenue and rolled into Dirksen Room 511, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah Hawkins were standing side by side around the reception television with tears in their eyes and smiles from ear to ear.

On the screen, live from his front porch in Danville with Aunt Marge Callaway standing beside him, former Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway was looking straight into a row of Roanoke and Richmond television cameras.

"Every conservative in the Commonwealth of Virginia who still believes in the United States Constitution owes Senator Katie Prairie and the sixty-seven Senators who stood with her today a debt of gratitude," Uncle Richard declared in his steady Southside baritone as the news chyron beneath him flashed FORMER VA GOP MAJORITY LEADER RICHARD CALLAWAY ENDORSES SEN. PRAIRIE'S 'GUILTY' & 'AYE' IMPEACHMENT VOTES. "When Senator Prairie voted Guilty to convict Garrett Thorne, Conrad Drayton, and Bret Halverson for selling out our Naval Station Norfolk sailors, and when she voted Aye to bar all three of those men from ever holding federal office again, she didn't cast a partisan vote. She cast the exact vote that George Mason and James Madison wrote into the Constitution to protect this Republic."

Before the television anchor could ask a follow-up question, the private direct line on Sarah's front desk chimed.

"It's Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge calling from the porch!" Sarah beamed, tapping the speakerphone button as Sam and Mandy leaned in beside our wheelchairs.

"Katie! Nate! David!" Uncle Richard's voice boomed warmly through the speakerphone once the television crew in his front yard had lowered their microphones. "Marge and I just watched President Clara Morales take the oath of office, and we wanted to tell you ourselves how proud we are of the two of you."

"Thank you, Richard—and thank you for going on the air in Danville to back both the Guilty vote and the Aye vote to bar them from office," I said warmly from my SwiftChair.

"Easiest endorsement of my life, Senator," Uncle Richard chuckled, before his voice took on the quiet, determined resolve of the old Majority Leader. "And now that President Morales has been sworn in and Garrett Thorne is barred from ever putting his name on a ballot again, the fever can finally break. Starting tomorrow morning, I'm rolling up my sleeves with every institutional conservative left in Virginia to clean up the Republican Party and bring it back to the honorable, problem-solving party I remembered when I served in the House of Delegates—so that one of these days, Marge and I can finally go back to voting for Republicans again."

Beside my wheelchair, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah exchanged a grin.

"Every Republican, Uncle Richard?" Mandy asked playfully.

Over the speakerphone from Danville, Uncle Richard let out a rich, warm laugh.

"Well, every Republican except one," the old lion of Southside Virginia corrected himself gently. "I already warned the state party committee this afternoon: I'm going back to voting Republican down the line—except when Katie Prairie runs for re-election to the United States Senate. As long as Katie's name is on that ballot, she has Marge's vote and mine."

Seconds after we thanked Uncle Richard and Aunt Marge and hung up the speakerphone, the breaking-news banner across the bottom of the reception television flashed bright red.

Down in Florida—stripped of the Presidency, stripped of his Secret Service successor authority, and barred for the rest of his life from ever putting his name on a ballot again—private citizen Garrett Thorne had just stormed out onto the driveway of his resort club in front of the cable cameras.

Even though sixty-eight United States Senators—including fourteen members of his own party—had just voted to convict and disqualify him, Garrett Thorne's narcissistic, ableist ego could not bear the humiliation that a forty-two-year-old autistic woman in a wheelchair and her twin brother had uncovered his four-hundred-million-dollar Naval Station Norfolk kickback scheme and delivered the closing constitutional case that ended his political life.

On live national television, his face purple with rage, Garrett Thorne launched a full-blown personal vendetta—blaming "Broken Katie Prairie" for his removal from office.

"Broken Katie Prairie did this to me!" Thorne screamed into the microphones, his voice cracking as he jabbed a finger toward the camera lenses. "Sixty-eight weak, spineless cowards let Broken Katie Prairie in her little wheelchair and her shut-in brother's rigged computers in Virginia Beach steal my Presidency and ban me from running in 2028! Broken Katie Prairie is the reason I was removed from office—she destroyed our movement, and no real patriot in Restore the Republic should ever give Broken Katie Prairie a single moment of peace!"

Uncle Richard hadn't even reached his front door in Danville before the impact of Thorne's tirade hit our fifth-floor suite.

Within sixty seconds, all eight external trunk lines on Sarah's front reception console began blinking frantic red at once as furious Restore the Republic extremists—incited by their deposed leader's live meltdown—started flooding our office switchboard.

Sarah's hand hovered over the receiver, her shoulders tensing, when Nate rolled his SwiftChair forward and gently rested his hand over the mute bar.

"Don't pick that up, Sarah," Nate said calmly.

Before the console could ring a third time, the double mahogany doors of Dirksen Room 511 swung open.

Stepping briskly into our reception room was the Senate Sergeant at Arms, flanked by Inspector Marcus Vance of the United States Capitol Police Threat Assessment Section and four plainclothes special agents wearing the gold lapel pins of the Capitol Police Dignitary Protection Division.

"Leave the phones on mute, Ms. Sarah—our telecom unit in the Capitol Police Command Center is cutting in on your external trunk lines right now," Inspector Vance said with calm, professional authority as two Senate telecommunications technicians stepped behind Sarah's desk and plugged a hardware trap-and-trace filter into the switchboard wall jack. "Every incoming call, voicemail, and IP packet threatening Senator Prairie, her family, or her staff is being routed directly to the Capitol Police Threat Assessment Section and the FBI Washington Field Office for felony prosecution under Title 18, Section 115 of the United States Code. None of the three of you will have to listen to a single one of those calls."

Sam, Mandy, and Sarah let out a collective breath as the blinking red lights on the console shifted to silent blue law-enforcement recording indicators.

Inspector Vance turned toward Dad, Nate, and me, his expression grave.

"Senator Prairie, we monitored former President Thorne's broadcast from Florida in real time," the Capitol Police Inspector said. "Because he singled you out by name and blamed you personally for his conviction and disqualification, our Threat Assessment Section has elevated your protective posture to Tier One. Uniformed Capitol Police officers are now posted outside Room 511 around the clock, and we've already coordinated twenty-four-hour residential patrols with the Alexandria Police Department on Sunset Drive and the Virginia Beach Police Department on Lord Nelson Drive. In addition, the Capitol Police Board has assigned a full-time plainclothes Dignitary Protection detail to accompany you and your brother everywhere you travel—and we have an armored black Capitol Police SUV waiting downstairs in the Dirksen courtyard to drive you, Nate, and Mr. Prairie home to Alexandria right now."

Inside Dirksen Room 511, the room went quiet.

Dad looked down at Nate and me, a knowing smile tugging at the corner of his mouth, while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah watched my wheelchair.

I kept my hands resting evenly on the armrests of my SwiftChair and looked up at Inspector Vance.

I wasn't the slightest bit afraid of Garrett Thorne—not after surviving Brandon Mercer switching off my wheelchair in the rain twenty-one years ago, and not after staring Thorne's lawyers down from the top tier of the Senate floor—but I took the protection of the United States Capitol Police very seriously, especially when it came to keeping Dad, Nate, and my staff safe.

"Inspector Vance, thank you—first and foremost for stepping in immediately to protect Sam, Mandy, and Sarah at the front desk, and for coordinating with Alexandria and Virginia Beach police," I said clearly. "We take your Threat Assessment team's protocols very seriously, and our office will follow every security procedure you set for Room 511 and our travel schedules. We will gladly accept your plainclothes Capitol Police Dignitary Protection detail, subject to two non-negotiable rules."

"Name them, Senator," Inspector Vance said.

"Rule one: nobody on the detail ever touches the push-handles of my wheelchair or my brother's wheelchair without asking our permission first," I said.

"Understood and already briefed to every agent on the team," Vance nodded. "And rule two?"

I glanced toward the framed purple-and-blue crayon drawing from Natalie Brooks hanging on our office wall, then over at Sam's desk—where Sam, Nate, and I had spent every spare hour between impeachment trial sessions drafting the federal transit appropriations rider to fund a public bus link across the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel—and finally at my twin brother Nate sitting in his SwiftChair beside me.

"Rule two, Inspector, is that you can send the armored SUV back to the garage," I said calmly. "Garrett Thorne is a disgraced private citizen who just got fired from the Presidency and permanently barred from ever holding public office again. I respect your officers' mission, and we will give your detail our exact train and bus times in advance so your agents can position themselves safely around us—but if I let Garrett Thorne's temper tantrum scare my brother and me off public transportation and lock us inside an armored truck, then Garrett Thorne wins. Plus, Sam, Nate, and I still have an hour of work left on our federal transit grant connecting Cape Charles on the Eastern Shore across the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel to the CVTA transfer point at Shore Drive and Pleasure House Road. At five-fifteen, Nate, Dad, and I—along with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah—are rolling down the elevator and out the accessible door to Capitol South Station to ride the Blue Line home to Alexandria, and tomorrow morning we are catching the ARTS train and the CVTA Route 24 bus home to Virginia Beach."

Nate grinned from his SwiftChair and held up his blue plastic transit card between two fingers.

"Your Dignitary Protection agents are more than welcome to ride with us, Inspector," my twin brother added cheerfully. "Just make sure every agent brings a loaded CapitalPass card—because on Senator Prairie's detail, everybody pays their fare and everybody rides the bus."

Saturday, July 17, 2027, 10:15 AM — How Thorne's Vendetta Heat Died Down & Rolling Off the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel Bus at Shore Drive and Pleasure House Road

For the next ten weeks, we followed every protocol the United States Capitol Police put in place—and while the cable pundits wondered how long Garrett Thorne's post-conviction vendetta against "Broken Katie Prairie" would last, we kept our heads down and did the legislative work the people of Virginia had sent us to Washington to do.

When reporters outside the Capitol South elevator asked me to respond to Thorne's latest rant from his Florida driveway, I didn't give his ego a single drop of the oxygen he was starving for.

"I'm grateful to the United States Capitol Police officers riding the Blue Line with us today, and I have complete confidence in federal law enforcement," I told the cameras without looking up from my committee folder. "Mr. Thorne is an unemployed private citizen in Florida with a federal court date. Right now my brother Nate, my Legislative Correspondent Sam, and I are marking up the federal funding to connect ShoreLine Transit in Cape Charles across the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel to the CVTA transfer point at Shore Drive and Pleasure House Road —because working families on the Eastern Shore and in Hampton Roads still have to get to work and the hospital tomorrow morning."

Watched closely by Inspector Vance's Threat Assessment team, the heat of Garrett Thorne's vendetta collapsed faster than anyone in Washington had predicted—extinguished by five cold, unmistakable realities.

First, within seventy-two hours of Thorne's April sixteenth outburst, the United States Capitol Police Threat Assessment Section and the FBI used the hardware trap-and-trace logs from Dirksen Room 511 to arrest the first fourteen Restore the Republic extremists who had called our switchboard with threats. When those callers were led into federal courthouses in handcuffs on the six o'clock news facing ten-year felony sentences under Title 18, Section 115 of the United States Code—and suddenly realized that Garrett Thorne was no longer President of the United States, possessed zero constitutional pardon power to save them, and wasn't paying a single dime toward their defense lawyers—the nerve of the online mob shattered overnight. Within two weeks, the threatening calls to our office dropped to zero.

Second, under Article I, Section 3, Clause 7 of the United States Constitution, removal by the Senate stripped Garrett Thorne of every shred of presidential immunity and left him, as a private citizen, "liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law." On May 12, 2027, a federal grand jury returned a thirty-four-count felony indictment against Garrett Thorne, Conrad Drayton, and Bret Halverson for federal bribery, wire fraud, money laundering, and Espionage Act violations over the four-hundred-million-dollar Naval Station Norfolk kickback scheme, while the Department of Justice froze Thorne Global Holdings' offshore accounts. At Thorne's federal arraignment that afternoon, as a strict condition of pre-trial release under Title 18, Section 3142 so he wouldn't await trial behind bars, the United States District Judge imposed an ironclad gag and no-harassment order: if Garrett Thorne uttered or posted the name of Senator Katie Prairie, her family, her staff, or any congressional witness on television or online, his bail would be revoked immediately and United States Marshals would remand him straight into a federal detention cell. Terrified of spending a single night in a jail cell, Thorne shut his mouth on the spot.

Third, our sixty-eight-vote Aye tally permanently barring Thorne from ever holding federal office again drained every ounce of his political leverage. A movement built on personal fealty to one man cannot survive once that man is legally barred from ever appearing on a ballot again. Within a month, the cable cameras at LibertyMax and the Liberty First Network stopped cutting to his driveway in Florida, ambitious politicians started fighting over the wide-open 2028 nomination as if Thorne were already ancient history, and back home in Virginia, Uncle Richard and a coalition of institutional conservatives began methodically cleaning out the state Republican party apparatus.

By Monday, July 12, 2027—after sixty consecutive days without a single credible threat logged against our office or our homes—Inspector Marcus Vance walked into Dirksen Room 511 with a warm smile, unplugged the trap-and-trace unit from Sarah's reception console, and informed Dad, Nate, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me that the Capitol Police Threat Assessment Section had officially downgraded our posture back to routine baseline and stood down our round-the-clock protective detail.

Five days later—on Saturday morning, July 17, 2027—all six of us celebrated getting our normal, quiet everyday lives back in the only way that felt right.

Having seen President Clara Morales sign our bipartisan Federal Rural & Bridge-Tunnel Transit Connectivity appropriation into law the month before—establishing dedicated Federal Transit Administration Section 5311(f) intercity operating funds to cover the seventeen-point-six-mile cross-bay span and the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel District's nominal Class 8 public-transit toll of one dollar per crossing via the agency fleet transponder, together with a mandatory statutory stipulation requiring a reciprocal cross-honoring agreement for all fares and passes between CVTA and ShoreLine Transit—Nate, Dad, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and I rode the inaugural southbound revenue run of the ShoreLine Transit / CVTA Bay Bridge-Tunnel Express south from Cape Charles.

Without a single armored SUV or protective detail trailing us, our low-floor bus glided through the electronic Class 8 toll lane at the North Toll Plaza for a single dollar, rolled out across the high trestles, and plunged through the two mile-long underwater tunnels of the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel—where the silver-green waves of the Chesapeake Bay met the open Atlantic Ocean—before climbing onto the south toll plaza at Wise Point and turning onto Shore Drive in Virginia Beach.

“Approaching Shore Drive and Pleasure House Road—Coastal Virginia Transit Authority Transfer Point,” the automated interior chime announced at ten-fifteen in the morning as our driver pulled smoothly into the concrete transfer bay just west of the bridge-tunnel approach, right beside a waiting low-floor CVTA bus with its amber LED destination sign glowing in the July sunshine.

As the driver kneeled the air suspension and deployed the front hydraulic ramp onto the Virginia Beach sidewalk at Pleasure House Road, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah stepped down onto the concrete with Dad, turning back to smile as Nate and I rolled our two SwiftChairs side by side down the ramp into the warm coastal breeze.

Up at the CVTA bus shelter, commuters in navy shipyard shirts, Eastern Shore hospital nurses, and summer beachgoers with backpacks were already stepping off our coach and walking ten feet across the sidewalk—where, thanks to the cross-honoring stipulation in our bill, the CVTA farebox accepted their ShoreLine Transit passes and transfers without charging them a single extra dime to continue into Norfolk and Virginia Beach.

Dad rested one hand on my shoulder and the other on Nate’s, looking back toward the shimmering span of the Chesapeake Bay Bridge-Tunnel stretching out to the northern horizon.

“No cameras, no guards, and a bus running right across the Bay to Pleasure House Road,” Dad said softly. “How does it feel to have your normal Saturday back, Senator?”

I looked over at Sam, Mandy, and Sarah chatting happily with the CVTA operator by the open front door, then up at Dad, and finally across the two inches between our armrests at my twin brother Nate.

“It feels like home, Dad,” I smiled, unlocking my joystick as Nate and I rolled side by side toward the open ramp of the waiting CVTA bus with our cross-honored passes in hand. “Come on—let’s tap our passes before we miss the transfer.”

Street Clothes on the Route 250 Connector, Unannounced in Fishersville, & Calling the Governor

ARTS Train 51 to Staunton, Street Clothes on the Route 250 Connector, & Calling Governor Langford From Fishersville

Date: 2027-07-21 at 11:39 America/New_York

Wednesday, July 21, 2027, 11:39 AM — ARTS Train 51 Out of Union Station & Eighty-Four Pages of Bureaucratic Smoke

“Watch the yellow lip plate there, folks—you’re clear right into the coach vestibule,” the uniformed ARTS conductor called out over the low hum of the locomotive on Track 24 at Washington Union Station, unlatching the safety chain on the blue hand-cranked mobile wheelchair lift at eleven-thirty-two on Wednesday morning so Katie and I could glide our SwiftChairs one behind the other into the accessible end of the Cardinal.

Neither the conductor nor a single passenger boarding westbound Train 51 gave the two of us a second glance, which was the entire point.

Nine days after Inspector Marcus Vance had stood down our round-the-clock Capitol Police protective detail, Katie and I were traveling the way we had traveled our whole adult lives—just the two of us, side by side, with zero advance staff, zero press advisories, and not a suit jacket or Senate lapel pin in sight. Katie wore a plain navy cotton V-neck polo shirt, dark jeans, and white sneakers; I wore a heather-grey crew-neck t-shirt, jeans, and canvas sneakers. Clipped to the rear uprights of our SwiftChairs were our two everyday daypacks, and strapped snug across the luggage rack behind my seatback was a dark-green compression sack holding our rolled flannel-lined double sleeping bag for tonight's hotel room in Staunton.

At eleven-thirty-nine sharp, the twin air horns sounded softly beneath the concrete deck, the couplers gave a gentle metallic tug, and Train 51 eased southward through the First Street Tunnel toward the Long Bridge across the Potomac River.

Once the train cleared our weekday stop in Alexandria and picked up speed past Manassas toward the Piedmont foothills, I reached into my backpack, pulled out an eighty-four-page glossy white comb-bound report stamped with the seal of the Virginia Department for Aging and Rehabilitative Services, and laid it flat across the wide drop-down accessible table in front of our locked wheelchairs.

"Listen to how Commissioner Sterling and Director Cross phrased Section Three on page twenty-nine," I murmured, angling the pages so Katie could read right alongside me without anyone two rows ahead overhearing. "In bold type at the top of the page, they certify to the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee that all five of your February seventeenth mandates have reached Substantial Phase-One Implementation ahead of next Thursday's full fiscal year 2028 markup, and formally ask your office to release the eighteen-point-five-million-dollar hold."

Katie rested her chin on two fingers, her blue eyes scanning down the dense paragraphs below the heading. "Now read the actual sentences underneath the bold header, Nate."

"On wheelchair bodily autonomy and client handbooks," I read quietly, tracing the lines with my index finger, "Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center has convened an interdisciplinary Stakeholder Policy Revision Working Group scheduled to circulate draft handbook language for administrative comment during the first quarter of 2028. On ending mandatory two-week manual-shop Vocational Evaluation tours for college-degreed students and unlocking the developer workstations in the Bates-Harding computer lab: DARS Vocational Services has initiated a pilot waiver scoping study, and VITA has logged an Enterprise Architecture Exception Request pending quarterly security board review. And on abolishing yellow Level 2 off-campus passes and adult sibling separation contracts in Barton Hall: Residential Operations is evaluating modernized community-sign-out workflows."

Katie closed the white plastic comb binder with a crisp, quiet snap.

“Five months, Nate,” she said softly, looking out the wide coach window as green Piedmont pastures flashed past the glass. “Five months since Marcus Sterling and Evelyn Cross sat behind those microphones in Dirksen Room 124 and promised under oath—in front of Natalie and Mrs. Brooks—that they would carry out every single one of those five reforms. Beyond locking down perimeter badge access and turning Christopher Vance’s unredacted 2007 files over to the Virginia State Police because state detectives and Chairman Harrington had a Friday five-o’clock clock hanging over their heads, everything affecting how disabled adults are treated inside Fishersville was buried in fake subcommittees—hoping nobody in Washington would check before next Thursday’s markup.”

“And if Sarah or Sam had called Richmond yesterday to schedule an official Senate oversight visit,” I said, resting my right hand over Katie’s across the two-inch gap between our armrests, “Sterling and Cross would have spent forty-eight hours hiding every yellow pass clipboard in a locked filing cabinet, taping temporary notices over the lobby racks, parking two VITA technicians in the computer lab with unlocked loaner laptops, and lining up five rehearsed administrators at the visitor sign-in desk.”

“Which is why nobody in Richmond, nobody at DARS, and nobody in Fishersville knows we got on this train,” Katie replied evenly, lacing her fingers through mine. “And why coming down a day early on Wednesday afternoon was the only way to do it right. If you try to ride down from Washington on the morning of an inspection, Train 51 doesn’t pull into Staunton until past three-thirty in the afternoon, when the Bates-Harding classrooms are already letting out for the day. Sleeping over in Staunton tonight puts us on the eight-thirty Route 250 Connector bus tomorrow morning right alongside the morning commuters—rolling up to the front visitor lobby at eight-fifty-two like any other pair of forty-two-year-old wheelchair riders in jeans, and only showing our ID when the sign-in desk requires it.”

All afternoon, as the Cardinal wound past Culpeper, Orange, and Charlottesville before climbing the steep eastern grade of Afton Mountain and plunging through the dark stone bore of the Blue Ridge Tunnel into the Shenandoah Valley, Katie and I worked quietly side by side on my MagnaBook Pro—cross-checking every page of DARS’s glossy compliance binder against the verbatim Congressional Record transcript from February seventeenth.

At three-thirty-four in the afternoon, the station brakes hissed gently beside the historic red-brick platform at Staunton Station in the Wharf district, one short block uphill from the Staunton Hub on Lewis Street. After the station agent cranked us down the mobile lift onto the warm sunlit bricks, Katie and I rolled across the quiet cobblestone crossing into the historic brick hotel beside the tracks, checked into our ground-floor accessible room under my credit card without mentioning the United States Senate once, shared a quiet supper of grilled chicken sandwiches and two ice-cold bottles of ginger ale, and unrolled our flannel-lined double sleeping bag inside the wide, carpeted ground-floor coat closet. Curling up side by side in the dark with Katie’s head tucked under my chin and our two SwiftChairs plugged into the wall outlet outside the closet door, we slept nine uninterrupted hours before the morning bus.

Thursday, July 22, 2027, 8:30 AM — Fifty Cents on the Route 250 Connector & The Front Visitor Sign-In Lobby

The air suspension of the white-and-green Shenandoah Valley Transit cutaway coach knelt with a soft pneumatic sigh against the concrete curb of the Staunton Hub on Lewis Street at eight-twenty-six on Thursday morning, and the driver stepped out in his short-sleeved uniform shirt to unfold the front wheelchair ramp.

“Morning, y’all—heading out toward Fishersville, the rehab center, or Waynesboro?” the operator asked cheerfully as Katie and I rolled up the aluminum incline one after the other.

“Roosevelt Avenue in Fishersville, please,” Katie smiled, dropping a single shiny quarter into the farebox coin slot for the twenty-five-cent half-fare disability rate on the fifty-cent valley route right before I dropped my own quarter in behind her.

Once the operator clicked the four retracting SafeLock floor straps onto our black SwiftChair frames and pulled away from Lewis Street at eight-thirty sharp onto U.S. Route 250 East, we didn’t even have to wait until we reached the front visitor desk to find out how much of Commissioner Sterling’s eighty-four-page binder was fiction.

Sitting directly across the center aisle from our wheelchairs were two twenty-something Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center residents riding back from an early-morning pharmacy run in downtown Staunton: a twenty-three-year-old woman named Kayla with dark curly hair, a plastic resident photo keycard hanging on a lanyard around her neck, and silver forearm crutches propped neatly between her knees; and a twenty-four-year-old guy named Trevor wearing his own resident keycard lanyard over a faded Blue Ridge Community College sweatshirt with a sketch tube across his lap.

Clipped right next to Kayla’s plastic door badge—flapping lightly in the cool air-conditioning vent every time the bus crested a rolling valley hill—was a crisp, freshly signed, canary-yellow rectangular slip of cardstock stamped across the top in heavy black ink: BARTON HALL — LEVEL 2 OFF-CAMPUS HALL PASS.

Beside me, Katie didn’t stiffen or stare; she just gave my pinky finger the tiniest tap across our inner armrests and smiled warmly across the aisle when Kayla glanced over at our powerchairs.

“Those compact black chairs turn way tighter than the loaner clunkers they’ve got down at the center,” Kayla remarked appreciatively, nodding toward our SwiftChair joysticks. “Are you two heading in for a nine-o’clock intake appointment at Fishersville today?”

“Just stopping by the front desk this morning to check on a few things,” Katie said gently, without a single untruth. “My brother Nate and I actually spent twelve days in Barton Hall twenty years ago before we went home and started our own software business. Don’t tell me they’re still making grown adults carry signed yellow paper Hall Passes just to ride a fifty-cent bus into Staunton.”

Trevor let out a bark of dry, incredulous laughter while Kayla rolled her eyes toward the ceiling of the bus.

“Oh, they upgraded the outer doors with new electronic badge readers after that big Senate hearing back in February so visitors can’t get past the front lobby without signing in,” Kayla said, flicking the corner of the canary-yellow paper with her thumb, “but for us residents? Not a single rule changed. We still have to beg the morning tech in Barton Hall to sign a yellow Level 2 slip before we step off campus, and the second we get off this bus we have to get it time-stamped at the front lobby window before nine o’clock—otherwise the dorm supervisor threatens to drop us down to a two-week Level 1 restriction where you aren’t allowed past the courtyard benches.”

“Wait until you hear the best part,” Trevor chimed in, leaning forward on his elbows as the green pastures of Augusta County rolled past the windows. “Back in February, when Virginia’s U.S. Senator tore the DARS bosses apart on television over grabbing wheelchair handles, locking down the computers, and forcing college graduates into manual trade shops, everybody in the dorms watched the clip on their phones and thought things were finally going to change.”

“And did anything change inside the classrooms?” I asked evenly.

“Not a thing,” Trevor snorted. “I graduated in May with an Associate of Applied Science in graphic and web design—three-point-eight GPA, full portfolio—and enrolled here strictly for an assistive-screen-magnifier accommodation setup and advanced front-end certification. Instead, Vocational Evaluation in the Bates-Harding Building forced me to spend all last week sorting lug nuts in the auto bay and folding hospital corners in the nursing lab. Yesterday afternoon—literally at three-fifteen yesterday—my evaluator looked across her desk at my college transcript and told me that if coding stylesheets strained my eyes too much, the center still has its wonderful retail-readiness partnership down the road in Waynesboro training clients to stand by the automatic doors as a ValueMart greeter.”

Across the two inches between our wheelchairs, I felt the muscles in Katie’s forearm go dead still against her armrest, though her voice stayed warm and steady for the two students across the aisle.

“What about the Web and Software classroom in Bates-Harding?” I asked. “Did VITA finally unlock local developer permissions on the state desktop computers?”

“Are you kidding?” Trevor laughed, shaking his head. “My roommate’s in that class right now. Every student still has to haul their own personal laptop from home and daisy-chain orange surge strips across the floor because VITA still has every state desktop locked down tighter than a bank vault. When the instructor asked administration about it on Monday, the Assistant Director told him Richmond parked all of the Senator’s Washington demands inside a 2028 Strategic Transition Task Force until after Congress passes their budget next week.”

“And heaven help anybody in a wheelchair who tells staff not to shove their chair,” Kayla added quietly as the green highway sign for Fishersville came into view ahead. “Last Thursday morning right inside the Bates-Harding visitor lobby, an intake supervisor walked up behind our friend Marcus, grabbed his push-handles without asking, and yanked him backward so a tour group could pass. When Marcus told him to take his hands off his chair, the guy threatened him with an aggression write-up and pointed straight at the old 2019 handbook rack in the lobby.”

At eight-fifty-two in the morning, the automated chime dinged above the windshield, and the SVT Route 250 Connector pulled onto the concrete bus pad along Roosevelt Avenue outside the sprawling red-brick campus of Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center.

“Thanks for the ride—and good luck in class today, Kayla and Trevor,” Katie said warmly as the driver unclipped our SafeLock straps and lowered the ramp onto the sunlit sidewalk.

“Nice meeting you guys!” Kayla smiled, swinging her crutches briskly up the paved front walk ahead of us toward the main entrance of the Bates-Harding Building without the faintest idea that she had just handed a live field briefing to the sitting United States Senator holding an eighteen-point-five-million-dollar padlock over the entire facility.

Side by side in our jeans and casual shirts, Katie and I rolled up the gentle concrete approach and glided through the aluminum-framed glass front entrance doors into the public visitor sign-in lobby.

Just as Kayla had told us on the bus, nobody could wander unbadged into the campus corridors anymore: twenty feet past the red-brick lobby pillar stood a raised security podium beside a set of badge-locked interior doors manned by a uniformed security attendant.

Yet RRC didn’t even bother hiding its foot-dragging behind the locked doors—it was sitting right out in the open inside the front entrance lobby.

Directly ahead of us at the sliding glass reception window, Kayla handed her canary-yellow Barton Hall Level 2 Off-Campus Hall Pass under the glass so the receptionist could thump it with a mechanical time-stamp clock—right beside a tall, four-inch-thick stack of blank canary-yellow Level 2 pass pads—before Kayla and Trevor tapped their resident lanyards at the inner security podium and disappeared through the locked hallway doors toward class. And mounted to the cinder-block wall beside the visitor sign-in counter was the public intake rack stuffed with crisp blue client handbooks stamped REVISED OCTOBER 2019 across the bottom corner, right underneath a laminated sign taped to the reception glass warning incoming clients and visiting relatives that Level 2 off-campus pass sign-outs and eleven-o’clock opposite-gender dorm lockouts were enforced without exception for adult siblings and family members.

Katie and I rolled quietly up to the glass visitor sign-in counter and paused so I could pull one of the blue October 2019 handbooks off the public rack, flipping straight to the residential conduct pages—not an addendum sheet, sticker, or wheelchair bodily-autonomy clause anywhere inside it. Beside me, looking from Kayla’s time-stamped canary-yellow slip to the unamended 2019 handbook in my hand, Katie’s jaw set hard, her blue eyes turning to pure ice.

“Good morning—if the two of you are signing in as visitors, I just need you to print your names on the log and slide a government photo ID under the window,” the receptionist behind the glass said pleasantly without looking up from her keyboard.

Katie reached into the front pocket of her dark jeans, and I reached for my wallet—when the aluminum-framed outer front entrance doors swung open behind our wheelchairs, letting in a gust of warm July air from the staff parking lot.

Thursday, July 22, 2027, 9:00 AM — Director Cross Arrives for Work, Signing In at the Front Window, & Calling Governor Langford Directly Walking briskly through the front entrance doors with her leather work tote over one shoulder and a travel mug of coffee in her hand—arriving right on the dot of nine o'clock to start her workday alongside Assistant Director Greg Saunders in his crisp light-grey button-down shirt—was Director Evelyn Cross.

"Did Richmond confirm whether Dirksen Room 511 cleared our hold memo yet, Greg?" Dr. Cross was asking cheerfully as the glass door hissed shut behind her heels.

Then Dr. Cross glanced toward the front visitor sign-in window—and stopped dead in her tracks on the green-and-white terrazzo floor.

For three full seconds, she stared at the back-quarter profile of our two matching black motorized SwiftChairs in casual jeans, sneakers, a navy polo, and a grey t-shirt as if her eyes were playing a cruel trick on her. Slowly, Katie and I pivoted our wheelchairs forty-five degrees from the sign-in counter to look straight at her—and one single look at the cold, silent fury written across Katie's face drained every drop of color from Evelyn Cross's cheeks.

"S-Senator Prairie?" Dr. Cross breathed nervously, her voice catching in her throat as Saunders froze solid beside her with his clipboard clutched against his chest. "… Nate?"

"Good morning, Dr. Cross," Katie said, her voice quiet, level, and cold as iron—without a trace of polite small talk.

Neither Katie nor I skipped a single line of the building's security procedure. Turning calmly back to the startled receptionist behind the glass while Dr. Cross and Assistant Director Saunders looked on in dawning horror, we printed both of our names onto the paper visitor log at nine-oh-one and slid our photo identification under the window slot just like any other visitors signing into a state facility: my horizontal Virginia DMV State ID card on the left—since under federal anti-nepotism law I never held a Senate employee badge, using my Sergeant at Arms family-companion pass strictly inside the Capitol complex and my Virginia State ID everywhere else as a private citizen—and, right beside it on the right, Katie's official wallet-sized United States Senate Member Identification Card issued by the Senate Sergeant at Arms and embossed with the gold Seal of the United States Senate.

Behind the reception glass, the young woman at the counter looked down at the gold Senate seal and holographic portrait beside Katie's name, looked out through the glass at Katie in her navy polo and jeans, and went nearly as pale as her boss. With trembling fingers, she slid both ID cards back under the slot along with two clip-on VISITOR — ESCORT REQUIRED badges.

"W-we had no idea—nobody in Richmond told us your office was coming to Fishersville today, Senator!" Dr. Cross stammered, taking a nervous half-step toward the counter.

"That's why it's called an unannounced visit, Dr. Cross," I said evenly, clipping my visitor pass to the collar of my grey t-shirt as Katie clipped hers to the placket of her polo. "Now that we're signed in and badged, we need fifteen minutes behind your security doors—escorted by you and Mr. Saunders so every campus security rule is followed to the letter. Take us straight to the Web and Software Applications classroom window and the Vocational Evaluation suite."

With zero minutes of lead time to send a runner ahead or hide a single extension cord, a visibly shaken Dr. Cross tapped her director's master badge against the security reader beside the guard podium and led our two wheelchairs down the interior corridor—while behind us in the front lobby, the reception staff didn't wait five seconds after the security door clicked shut before snatching up the office telephone to call DARS headquarters in Richmond in a full-blown panic.

Fifteen minutes behind the badge doors was five minutes more than we needed.

Through the wire-reinforced observation glass of the Web and Software Applications lab, Dr. Cross had to stand in mortified silence right beside our wheelchairs as Katie and I counted seven disabled adult students huddled over personal laptops plugged into daisy-chained orange floor surge strips while twelve state-issued desktop towers sat dark and unusable along the cinder-block wall beneath blue VITA asset tags. Two doors down in the Vocational Evaluation intake suite, sitting in a neat wire tray right beside the evaluator sign-in desk, was a freshly printed stack of glossy recruitment flyers for the Waynesboro ValueMart Retail Greeter Readiness Partnership alongside mandatory two-week manual-shop rotation checklists for incoming degree-holders.

At nine-twenty, Katie didn't ask to see another room. Without a word, she and I turned our SwiftChairs around in tight parallel formation and rolled right back out through the security podium into the public front entrance lobby.

Behind the glass reception window—right beside the four-inch stack of canary-yellow Level 2 passes—one staffer was clutching the beige office handset tightly to her ear on hold with DARS executive offices in Richmond while a second alarmed staffer stood beside the filing cabinets clutching two manila compliance folders to her chest.

"Senator Prairie, please," Dr. Cross pleaded breathlessly, hurrying out into the terrazzo front lobby beside a pale, silent Greg Saunders as we locked our wheelchair brakes near the red-brick reception pillar. "If your office had just let Commissioner Sterling know you were coming, we could have walked you through the timeline! Our stakeholder working groups are meeting biweekly on the 2019 handbook, VITA has our classroom exception ticket queued for next quarter's security board, and Commissioner Sterling's office in Richmond is pulling the Secretary onto the phone right now—"

"Stop talking, Dr. Cross," Katie said quietly.

She didn't raise her voice by a single decibel, yet the ice-cold fury behind those four words froze everyone in the front lobby where they stood.

Sitting straight in her SwiftChair in her navy cotton polo and jeans while I flipped open my MagnaBook Pro across my knees to our timestamped morning notes, Katie looked straight across the terrazzo floor at Dr. Cross and Assistant Director Saunders.

“Forty-eight hours ago, you and Commissioner Sterling delivered an eighty-four-page signed certification to my office on the Senate Appropriations Committee claiming that Phase One of all five statutory reforms you promised under oath on February seventeenth was substantially implemented—asking me to release eighteen and a half million federal tax dollars in next Thursday’s markup,” Katie said, every word landing like cold steel. “Yesterday afternoon, Nate and I rode ARTS Train 51 down to Staunton in our regular clothes, stayed overnight, and paid twenty-five cents apiece to ride the eight-thirty Route 250 Connector bus onto Roosevelt Avenue this morning. You fixed your front door locks because the cameras shamed you into it—and then you parked every single reform protecting the dignity and education of disabled adults inside fake 2028 task forces while telling your instructors you only had to wait until Congress passed your budget.”

Dr. Cross swallowed hard, unable to speak.

“In less than thirty minutes,” Katie continued evenly, “we watched a twenty-three-year-old resident on crutches get a canary-yellow Level 2 Hall Pass time-stamped at that window under threat of a two-week Level 1 lock-in, and heard how an intake supervisor right here in this lobby grabbed a wheelchair user’s push-handles without consent last Thursday and threatened him with an aggression write-up. We spoke to an honors web-design college graduate whom your staff forced to sort lug nuts in the auto bay all last week before pitching him yesterday afternoon on standing by the doors of the Waynesboro ValueMart as a greeter. We pulled an unamended October 2019 handbook right off your front lobby rack under a laminated eleven-o’clock adult-sibling lockout sign. And twenty seconds down that hall, twelve VITA-locked desktops are still gathering dust while students code over floor extension cords.”

Behind the glass window, the receptionist cupped her hand anxiously over the telephone mouthpiece and leaned toward the slot: “Dr. Cross—DARS Richmond has Commissioner Sterling’s deputy on the line asking what he should tell the Secretary—”

“Tell your receptionist she can hang up on DARS, Dr. Cross,” Katie said flatly, sliding her dark mPhone out of her jeans pocket. “If Commissioner Sterling thinks five months of foot-dragging and a dishonest binder to the United States Senate is how state agencies treat an Appropriations hold, Nate and I aren’t wasting another breath on DARS.”

During her final year in the Senate of Virginia in Richmond—and throughout every mile of the 2026 statewide campaign after Virginia voters elected fellow Democrat Rebecca Langford to the Governor’s Mansion—Katie and Governor Langford had forged a direct, zero-drama working partnership built on mutual trust and plain speaking. Neither woman ever called the other’s personal cell for small talk during a legislative week; when Senator Prairie called Governor Langford directly, it was time to talk business.

Right there in the front visitor lobby in front of Dr. Cross, Assistant Director Saunders, and the panicked staff behind the glass window, Katie tapped Rebecca Langford on her screen and held the phone up on speakerphone.

The line rang once. Halfway through the second ring, it clicked open.

“Katie! Good morning,” Governor Rebecca Langford’s crisp, warm voice filled the terrazzo front lobby. “Tell me you and Nate aren’t already buried in Appropriations markup spreadsheets before ten o’clock on a Thursday.”

“Good morning, Rebecca,” Katie said clearly, holding the matte-black phone steady near her chin while I kept our audit log open on my laptop beside her. “Nate is right here beside me, and I want to let you know up front that you’re on speakerphone—because Nate and I aren’t in Washington. Yesterday afternoon we took the ARTS train down to Staunton, and at eight-fifty-two this morning we rolled off the Route 250 Connector bus in street clothes into the front visitor lobby at Roosevelt Rehabilitation Center in Fishersville, where Dr. Evelyn Cross, her Assistant Director Greg Saunders, and her front-desk staff are standing in front of us right now.”

Over the speaker grille, the shift in atmospheric pressure from Richmond was instantaneous. Every trace of casual morning warmth vanished into pure, razor-sharp executive command.

“Hold five seconds while I shut my office door and conference Arthur Lawrence onto this line with us, Katie,” Governor Langford said briskly. Two crisp clicks sounded over the speaker, followed immediately by Chief of Staff Arthur Lawrence’s voice joining from Capitol Square:

“Senator Prairie, Nate—I’m on with the Governor. Go ahead. Commissioner Sterling sent the Governor’s Office a signed memo on Tuesday afternoon swearing up and down that Fishersville had completed Phase One of every single mandate from your February hearing ahead of next week’s markup.”

“Commissioner Sterling’s memo lied to the Governor and lied to the Senate Appropriations Committee, Arthur,” Katie replied evenly.

Without raising her voice or adding a single word of embellishment, Katie took Governor Langford and Chief of Staff Lawrence line by line through every fact we had verified on the bus, at the front visitor sign-in window, and on our fifteen-minute escorted tour behind the security doors—while I read out the exact form titles, the October 2019 handbook revision stamp from the lobby rack, Kayla’s time-stamped canary-yellow Level 2 pass, Marcus’s wheelchair-handle write-up threat in the lobby the previous week, Trevor’s three-fifteen Wednesday ValueMart greeter pitch, and the twelve dark VITA-tagged desktop towers in the classroom.

Behind the reception glass to Katie’s left, the receptionist quietly lowered the DARS Richmond telephone receiver onto her shoulder, staring out through the window in stunned silence. There was no point begging DARS headquarters for talking points when the Governor of Virginia and her Chief of Staff were speaking live into the front lobby.

When I finished reading the last line from my screen, two seconds of icy silence came over the line from Richmond.

“Dr. Cross,” Governor Langford’s voice cut across the front lobby like a gavel strike. “I assume you can hear Arthur and me clearly?”

Dr. Cross swallowed visibly, staring at the phone in Katie’s hand as her fingers trembled at her sides. “Y-yes, Governor Langford. Yes, Mr. Lawrence.”

“Listen to me very carefully, Dr. Cross,” the Governor said, her tone clinical and utterly implacable. “Your front desk can hang up with DARS headquarters in Richmond, because Arthur just summoned Commissioner Marcus Sterling and the Secretary of Health and Human Resources across Capitol Square to my office in ten minutes to explain to me face-to-face why an agency of my administration submitted a false compliance certification to Virginia’s United States Senator—and anyone whose signature is on a false representation to Congress will have their resignation on my desk before five o’clock today.”

Across the terrazzo floor, Dr. Cross went ashen, while beside her Assistant Director Saunders stared straight ahead at the brick column without moving a muscle.

“Second,” Chief of Staff Arthur Lawrence cut in on the conference line, his voice just as hard as he had sounded in February, “the State Inspector General, the Chief Information Officer of VITA, and I are getting into a state car at Capitol Square within thirty minutes and driving straight up Interstate 64 to Fishersville. We will be walking through those front lobby doors behind you before one o’clock this afternoon—and don’t bother trying to hide a single clipboard before we get there, because we already have Nate’s inventory list.”

“By noon tomorrow,” Governor Langford added firmly, “an emergency executive directive under my signature will permanently abolish off-campus paper pass restrictions and adult family lockout rules across Fishersville, pull every 2019 handbook from circulation, require signed acknowledgment of wheelchair bodily autonomy from every employee on your payroll, end mandatory manual-shop Vocational Evaluation rotations and retail-greeter pitches for college-degreed or credentialed adults, and keep VITA’s engineering strike team physically on site in that classroom until every developer workstation is unlocked on an isolated instructional network. Do you understand me, Dr. Cross?”

“Yes, Governor,” Dr. Cross whispered hoarsely.

“Katie, Nate,” Governor Langford said, her voice steadying with unmistakable respect as she addressed us directly, “thank you for calling me straight away instead of letting Sterling’s binder sit until markup. Arthur and the Inspector General will transmit a full audit readout to Dirksen Room 511 tonight.”

“Thank you, Rebecca, and thank you, Arthur,” Katie said, looking squarely across the lobby at Dr. Cross and Saunders so everyone in Fishersville heard the federal standard in plain English at the exact same moment Richmond did. “And so there is zero confusion between Richmond, Fishersville, and Washington about what proof my office needs before I lift my hold on that eighteen-point-five-million-dollar appropriation: I do not lift holds for task forces, VITA tickets, or promises. My hold remains locked next Thursday in Subcommittee markup, and it stays locked through full Committee conference until the Virginia Office of the State Inspector General and federal Rehabilitation Services Administration auditors certify to my office in writing—backed by live unlocked classroom developer logins, published updated handbooks, signed employee training rosters, electronic keycard security logs, and confidential, unmonitored interviews with current Barton Hall residents—that all five reforms are operating in real life every day when nobody thinks a Senator is watching.”

Katie paused for half a beat, glancing toward the sunny bus stop out on Roosevelt Avenue beyond the glass entrance doors.

“And Rebecca?” Katie added calmly. “Tell whoever is sitting in the Director’s chair next month not to bother staging a VIP tour for us—because Nate and I still have quarters left in our pockets, and we know the Route 250 bus schedule by heart.”

Over the speakerphone, Governor Langford answered without a fraction of a second’s hesitation:

“Loud and clear, Senator. Have a safe ride back to Washington with Nate—Arthur and I have Fishersville and Richmond from here.”

Thursday, July 22, 2027, 9:48 AM — Signing Out at the Front Window, Westbound on the 250 Connector, & ARTS Train 50 Home

Katie tapped the screen to end the call, slipped her mPhone back into her jeans pocket, and rolled calmly up to the reception slot alongside me so both of us could unclip our visitor badges, slide them back under the glass, and write 9:48 AM beside our signatures on the front-lobby visitor log.

“You folks have a busy morning ahead of you before the Governor’s Chief of Staff and the Inspector General pull into the front lot,” I said mildly as Katie and I unlocked our joysticks and steered past the frozen Director and Assistant Director toward the glass entrance doors. “We can find our own way out to the bus stop.”

Gliding side by side out through the automatic front doors into the warm Shenandoah Valley sunshine, we rolled down the paved walkway back to Roosevelt Avenue with the whole late morning ahead of us—catching the westbound SVT Route 250 Connector back into historic downtown Staunton for an unhurried lunch together on Beverley Street, picking up our green sleeping-bag compression sack from the hotel bell desk across the cobblestone wharf, and rolling onto the red-brick platform at Staunton Station fifteen minutes before eastbound ARTS Train 50 glided around the curve beneath the Sears Hill pedestrian bridge at two-twenty-eight.

Five minutes later, once the conductor cranked us up the mobile lift into the cool, quiet coach vestibule and Train 50 eased eastward out of Staunton toward the Blue Ridge Mountains, Katie locked her brakes right beside mine, leaned her shoulder gently against my arm, and laced her fingers through my left hand across our armrests.

“Worth coming down the night before?” I asked softly, watching the green valley farms slip past the train window.

Katie smiled, resting her head briefly against my shoulder as the rhythm of the welded rail hummed beneath our wheels all the way back toward Alexandria.

“Every single quarter, Nate,” my twin sister murmured. “Every single quarter.”

Three Senate Terms, Refusing the 2044 Nomination, & The Stop #0812 Four-Seat Presidential Endorsement Loop

Part 1: The Biggest Prize in the Primary: Sam, Mandy, & Sarah's Bus-Loop Plan & Stop #0812

Date: 2044-01-29 at 13:15 America/New_York

Friday, January 29, 2044, 1:15 PM — Our Dining Room Table on Arvin Road

"That was the fifth presidential campaign manager since nine o'clock this morning," forty-one-year-old Sarah Hawkins said, setting her tablet down on our wooden dining room table on Arvin Road as she took a seat beside her identical twin sister Mandy and their fraternal triplet brother Sam. "Governor Caldwell's political director called twice, Senator Vance's chief of staff called from New York, Congressman Pierce's scheduler emailed three times, Governor Whitman's team wants Thursday morning, and Governor Delgado's chief of staff asked if you had twenty minutes on your Virginia Beach calendar next month."

Sitting side by side in our brushed-silver and black motorized SwiftChair power wheelchairs across the dining table, my fifty-eight-year-old twin sister Katie and I looked up from our turkey sandwiches.

"Why are they all calling on the same Friday afternoon?" Katie asked, taking a sip of her ginger ale.

Mandy turned her laptop screen toward our side of the table so Katie and I could read the lead story on the national political wire.

"Because the national primary tracking poll came out at noon," Mandy said. "Ever since you turned down the presidential draft at the Military Highway bus stop in October and announced you're retiring from the Senate in January after three terms, forty-one percent of likely Democratic primary voters nationwide say their single top criterion for choosing a candidate is whoever Senator Katie Prairie endorses. The article literally calls your endorsement 'the single biggest prize in the 2044 Presidential Primary.'"

"And every single one of those campaign managers expects the standard Washington endorsement routine," Sam added, adjusting his sweater vest as he leaned his elbows on the table between his two sisters. "Senator Vance's chief of staff asked me which private dining room at the downtown hotel in Norfolk he should reserve so the Senator can bring his policy binders and talk about offering you Secretary of Transportation or Health and Human Services. And Former Vice President Sterling's advance team called asking if the Secret Service could sweep The Atlantic Grand Hotel down at the Oceanfront next week."

Katie shook her head immediately. “Former Vice President Sterling is an automatic no. Anyone who already has Secret Service protection has to shut down streets and pull public buses out of service wherever they go, and I am not letting a motorcade inconvenience a single commuter in Hampton Roads. And I certainly don’t want a Cabinet job that puts Nate and me inside a government SUV.”

“We told them that,” Sarah grinned.

Looking across the dining table at Sam, Mandy, and Sarah, I couldn’t help smiling at how little had changed between the five of us over the past twenty-eight years. We had first met them in January of 2016 when they were thirteen-year-old eighth-grade House Pages in Richmond who had just been rescued by their maternal uncle—former Republican House Majority Leader Richard Callaway—and Aunt Marge. They had worked for Katie through college in Richmond, moved up to Washington with us when Katie won her first Senate term in 2026, and stood beside our wheelchairs in Danville when we wept together at Uncle Richard’s funeral after he passed away before Katie’s 2038 re-election campaign, just a few years after Katie and I had lost our own dad, David Prairie.

Now forty-one years old, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah were still together every single day—sharing a townhouse a few blocks from our place in Alexandria when the Senate was in session and a ranch house two streets over from us here in Kempsville when we were home in Virginia Beach. None of the three had ever married, none of them had ever had kids, and after learning years ago about the 2005 Ocean View nightmare Katie and I had gone through with Brandon Mercer and Tiffany Sloan, the triplets had never even gone looking for romantic partners. Just like Katie and me, the three of them knew that their safest, happiest life was the one they had built together.

Suddenly, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah exchanged a look across the dining table—the exact synchronous triplet glance we had seen a thousand times in Dirksen Room 511 whenever the three of them had cooked up a legislative ambush.

“Wait a minute,” I said, setting my sandwich down. “I know that look. What did the three of you come up with?”

Sam reached into his canvas messenger bag, pulled out a folded paper Coastal Virginia Transit Authority system map, and spread it flat across the center of the dining room table.

“All of these presidential candidates think they’re coming down to Virginia Beach to sit in a quiet office or a hotel conference room, read you talking points out of a three-ring binder, and leave after thirty minutes without ever meeting a single person who actually lives here,” Sam said, tapping his index finger on the intersection of Military Highway and Indian River Road—just around the corner from our front door on Arvin Road. “What if we don’t meet them in an office at all?”

“Look at the bus stop number right on the northeast corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road,” Mandy said, pointing to the tiny blue rectangle printed on the CVTA map. “Your home bus stop is Stop #0812.”

“And right behind Stop #0812 is the shopping center at Military Highway and Indian River Road,” Sarah chimed in, her eyes sparkling. “If Nate sends their campaign schedulers a two-line calendar invite that just says Military Highway and Indian River Road, Northeast Corner — #0812, every single campaign advance team in Washington is going to assume #0812 is Suite 812 in that corner shopping plaza!"

Katie's blue eyes went wide, and a slow, delighted smile spread across her face. "They'll show up in their suits carrying their briefing binders looking for Suite 812—and find the five of us waiting at Bus Stop #0812!"

"And look at the schedule from Stop #0812 on Tuesday and Thursday mornings," Sam said, tracing his finger north up Military Highway on the map. "We don't notify CVTA ahead of time—because if CVTA management knows you're interviewing presidential candidates on their buses, they'll panic and send a brand-new bus with a road supervisor. Instead, the candidate gets the exact length of a four-seat regularly scheduled transit trip with the five of us to seek your endorsement:

"First, we catch the nine-eighteen northbound Route 15 right at Stop #0812 and ride it up Military Highway to Military Highway Station," Sam continued. "Second, we roll up onto the platform for Route 800—The Surge Light Rail—and ride it one stop east from Military Highway Station to Newtown Road Station. Third, we transfer at Newtown Road Station to the ten o'clock Route 25 down Newtown Road and Princess Anne Road to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus. And fourth, after waiting out the twenty-nine-minute hourly transfer window at the CCHR campus bus loop, we catch the ten-fifty-three inbound Route 12 back along Lynnhaven Parkway, Kempsville Road, and Indian River Road right back to Stop #0812!"

"And because it's regularly scheduled transit service," Mandy added, "not only do you let the passengers and the bus operators ask the candidate questions—you actively encourage them to ask questions!"

"And what if a candidate gets on the bus and earns my endorsement?" Katie asked, looking around the table at the four of us.

"We don't tell them at the bus stop," I said, picking up the thread immediately as Katie and the triplets nodded. "When we get off the Route 12 back at Stop #0812, we say a polite goodbye, wheel ourselves right around the corner back home here to Arvin Road, and you and I talk it over quietly between the two of us. If the candidate doesn't earn your endorsement, the video from my mPhone stays on our offline hard drive and never sees the light of day. And once we decide who you are endorsing, I simply upload the video of their bus ride quietly with no fanfare—and title the video so it's clear to the whole country that this is the person you're endorsing for President of the United States."

Katie looked across the dining table at Sam, Mandy, and Sarah, and then over at me.

"Sam, Mandy, Sarah—that is the single best idea I have heard in eighteen years in the Senate," Katie beamed. "And all three of you are riding every single loop right alongside Nate and me. Send the calendar invites for Stop #0812, Nate!"

Tuesday, February 2, 2044, 9:08 AM — Stop #0812 at Military Highway & Indian River Road

“Which door is your suite, Nate?” Senator Julian Vance of New York asked, adjusting the collar of his camel-hair overcoat as he stepped onto the concrete sidewalk at the northeast corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road at eight minutes past nine on Tuesday morning, February 2, 2044. He glanced past our two SwiftChair power wheelchairs—and past Sam, Mandy, and Sarah standing in their winter coats right beside us—toward the brick shopping center behind the sidewalk, cradling a gold-embossed leather briefing binder titled THE VANCE-PRAIRIE PARTNERSHIP FOR AMERICA under his arm. “My advance team saw Military Highway and Indian River Road — #0812 on your calendar invite and assumed #0812 was a professional office suite, and all I see is a Market Square grocery store, a dry cleaner, and a tax storefront.”

“There is no office suite, Julian,” Katie said pleasantly from her wheelchair, reaching up to tap the blue-and-white metal sign bolted to the steel pole beside her left wheel: CVTA STOP #0812 — MILITARY HWY & INDIAN RIVER RD (ROUTES 12, 15). “You’re standing at it. Stop number zero-eight-one-two. This is Nate’s and my home bus stop.”

Senator Vance blinked down at the five of us as four lanes of morning traffic hummed past the intersection.

“I beg your pardon?” Vance said.

Down the right-hand curb lane of northbound Military Highway, the forty-foot blue-and-silver nine-eighteen CVTA Route 15 coach clicked on its right turn signal and eased toward the sidewalk behind two hospital housekeepers in teal scrubs and a young shipyard apprentice carrying a metal lunchbox.

“You’re joking, Katie,” Vance said, lowering his voice and glancing at the commuters stepping up to the curb as the air brakes hissed and the front suspension kneeled. “I flew down from LaGuardia at six-thirty this morning to sit down with you in private and offer you your choice of Transportation or Health and Human Services in a Vance Administration. Have Nate or one of your staffers call a ride-share van for your chairs—my people reserved a quiet boardroom at the downtown hotel in Norfolk.”

“I don’t want a Cabinet post, Julian,” Katie replied calmly as the aluminum wheelchair ramp folded out onto the concrete with three warning beeps. “We didn’t notify CVTA that we were riding today, so this is the regular nine-eighteen northbound Route 15. The five of us are riding it with you up to Military Highway Station, taking Route 800—The Surge Light Rail—one stop to Newtown Road Station, transferring to the ten o’clock Route 25 down to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, and catching the ten-fifty-three inbound Route 12 back along Indian River Road to Stop #0812. You have the length of that trip to make your case—and because this is public transit, I encourage the passengers and operators to ask you questions while Nate records on his mPhone.”

Vance stared at the rubber flooring of the Route 15 entry vestibule, then at the two hospital housekeepers waiting behind him, and finally at Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me.

“Katie, be serious,” Vance said, his voice tightening. “I am a United States Senator running for President of the United States. I do not ride a city bus with random commuters for two hours, and I certainly don’t sit at a community-college bus shelter taking unvetted questions on a cell phone camera.”

“Then you don’t need to get on the bus, Julian,” Katie said evenly, keeping her wheelchair on the sidewalk and waving to our driver Darnell that the five of us weren’t boarding this run after all so he could pull the ramp back in and stay on schedule. “Have a safe flight back to New York.”

Vance stood on the concrete pad for three seconds, tucked his leather binder tightly under his arm, turned on his heel, and walked briskly back across the Indian River Road crosswalk toward his idling black luxury SUV.

As the Route 15 bus pulled back into traffic up Military Highway, Sam, Mandy, and Sarah looked down at Katie and me and burst out laughing in the crisp morning air.

“That took less than four minutes,” Sam grinned.

“And since Stop #0812 is our home bus stop,” Katie smiled, turning her SwiftChair around on the wide concrete sidewalk toward the shopping center right behind us, “we don’t even have to take a bus home. Let’s roll into the Market Square grocery store right here in the plaza, grab five cold drinks, and wheel ourselves back around the corner to Arvin Road.”

That night at ten-fifteen, while Katie, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and I were finishing a late-evening transit markup in our living room on Arvin Road before the triplets walked back to their house two streets over, my mPhone buzzed on the end table.

It was the campaign manager for Governor Gary Whitman of Colorado—the moderate governor backed by three large private-equity hospital networks who was scheduled to meet us at Stop #0812 on Thursday morning.

“Nate, I’m calling with terrible news,” the campaign manager said breathlessly over the speaker. “Governor Whitman has to fly back to Denver tonight for an urgent state budget consultation, so we’re going to have to pass on Thursday morning’s meeting in Virginia Beach.”

“Understood,” I said politely. “Good luck with the budget.”

As soon as I tapped the red end-call icon, Mandy looked around the living room at the four of us.

“Julian Vance’s campaign manager called Whitman’s team and told them Marker #0812 is a city bus stop where nurses and college students get to ask questions on camera,” Mandy said.

“And Whitman’s healthcare donors would pull his funding in ten minutes if a Tidewater Health nurse pinned him down on private-equity hospital staffing ratios,” Sam agreed, picking up his coat as he and his sisters got ready to head home for the night. “See you both Tuesday morning for Governor Caldwell!”

Part 2: The First Tuesday on the Loop: Governor Harrison Caldwell on Routes 15, 800, 25, & 12

Date: 2044-02-09 at 09:10 America/New_York

Tuesday, February 9, 2044, 9:10 AM — Stop #0812 & Leg 1 Aboard CVTA Route 15 With Governor Harrison Caldwell

“Wait—a bus? Huh?!”

At ten minutes past nine on Tuesday morning, February 9, 2044, sixty-one-year-old Governor Harrison Caldwell of Illinois stood on the concrete sidewalk at Stop #0812 at Military Highway and Indian River Road in a tailored navy pinstripe suit, crimson silk tie, and dark wool overcoat, staring from the blue metal bus stop pole to the forty-foot CVTA Route 15 coach pulling into the curb lane behind a nurse in gray scrubs and a construction worker in a heavy canvas jacket. Across the street in the shopping plaza parking lot, four of Caldwell’s campaign aides stood beside two rented black SUVs holding three-ring policy binders and silver thermal coffee carafes.

“Senator Prairie, you conduct your presidential endorsement interviews on board a regularly scheduled city bus—and the passengers and the bus driver get to ask me questions too?!” Caldwell asked, looking from our two SwiftChairs to Sam, Mandy, and Sarah standing in their coats right behind our wheelchairs.

“Every candidate gets the exact same route with the five of us, Governor,” Katie said warmly from her SwiftChair. “We start right here at Stop #0812—which is Nate’s and my home bus stop—on the nine-eighteen northbound Route 15 up to Military Highway Station, ride Route 800—The Surge Light Rail—one stop east to Newtown Road Station, catch the ten o’clock Route 25 down to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, and transfer to the ten-fifty-three inbound Route 12 back along Indian River Road to Stop #0812. Your staff stays across the street. You have the length of that transit loop to tell us why you should be the next President of the United States.”

Caldwell glanced back across the intersection at his aides, straightened his silk tie, and forced a broad campaign smile onto his face.

“Well! Nobody can say Harrison Caldwell doesn’t love public transportation!” he declared, gesturing for one of his aides to run across the crosswalk and take his thick leather binder back to the SUV. “After you, Senator!”

Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: ramp is deploying!

Katie and I rolled up the aluminum ramp first, greeted Darnell in the driver’s seat, tapped our passes against the reader, and backed our two SwiftChairs into the front securement bays while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah tapped their passes and took the row of seats immediately behind my wheelchair.

On the front steps beside the farebox, Caldwell pulled a crisp twenty-dollar bill out of his leather billfold and tried to slide it into the dollar-bill slot.

The machine beeped twice and spat the twenty back into his hand.

“Your farebox is jammed, driver,” Caldwell said loudly, trying to push the twenty-dollar bill in a second time while three commuters waiting on the steps behind him shifted their weight in the cold air. “Just hand me four ones and two quarters out of your drawer.”

Darnell looked up into his overhead mirror. “Sir, bus fareboxes don’t make change. Exact fare only—four dollars and fifty cents for an all-day GoPass, or two dollars for a single ride.”

“Who carries singles and quarters in 2044?” Caldwell muttered, patting his suit pockets until a sixty-year-old woman in a cafeteria coat standing behind him sighed, reached past his elbow, and fed two crumpled one-dollar bills and two quarters of her own into the slot so Darnell could print the pass and close the doors.

“Thank you, ma’am—I’ll have my staff reimburse you!” Caldwell told her hurriedly as the bus pulled away from Stop #0812.

Once Caldwell sat down on the sideways perimeter bench across the aisle from our wheelchairs, Katie turned her head toward the passengers filling the center rows and introduced him with genuine warmth.

“Good morning, everybody on the nine-eighteen northbound Route 15!” Katie called out clearly over the hum of the diesel engine as we crossed Indian River Road. “This is Governor Harrison Caldwell of Illinois, and he’s running for President of the United States. He’s riding with Nate, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me up to Military Highway Station, over on The Surge to Newtown Road, down Route 25 to CCHR, and back on the Route 12 to ask for my endorsement. Nobody gave him any questions in advance—so if you have a question for somebody who wants to be your next President, raise your hand and ask away!”

Two seats down the bench from Caldwell, the construction worker in the canvas jacket raised his hand.

“Governor,” the man said, “my dad worked thirty-four years at Norfolk Naval Shipyard, and my mom needs thirty hours a week of in-home Medicaid personal care here in Virginia Beach so she doesn’t get forced into a nursing home. Last month on a Sunday morning interview show, you said Congress needs a ‘bipartisan commission to rein in mandatory healthcare entitlements.’ When you say ‘entitlements,’ do you mean my mother’s home-care nurse?”

Instead of looking at the worker sitting two feet to his left, Caldwell angled his shoulders toward the front of the bus so he was speaking straight into the lens of my mPhone mounted on my laptop screen.

“What I have proposed is a commonsense, data-driven fiscal modernization framework that empowers state-level flexibility while preserving the safety net for the truly needy,” Caldwell said in his polished debate-stage baritone.

“Sir, I’m sitting right here to your left,” the worker said evenly. “And I asked whether ‘state-level flexibility’ means cutting my mom’s thirty hours a week.”

“Well, every state’s actuarial tables and block-grant formulas are going to look a little different,” Caldwell replied, tapping his knee as the bus slowed for the turn into Military Highway Station.

Tuesday, February 9, 2044, 9:34 AM — Route 800 (The Surge Light Rail), Route 25 to CCHR, Route 12, & Our Decision at Home on Arvin Road

At Military Highway Station, we rolled off the Route 15 ramp and up the sloped concrete walkway with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah onto the center platform for Leg 2: CVTA Route 800, The Surge Light Rail.

When the sleek silver-and-blue two-car electric train glided up to the level boarding strip and the double doors chimed open, Katie and I rolled straight into the mobility bay inside the vestibule with Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and Caldwell stepping in beside us for the three-minute, one-stop ride eastbound to the terminus at Newtown Road Station.

Looking around the light-rail car as the train accelerated along the interstate sound wall, Caldwell chuckled and shook his head.

“Now this is a cute little three-minute trolley ride, Senator,” Caldwell said, loud enough for the entire vestibule to hear. “Though as a chief executive, I have to ask—why are we taking a train for one single stop just to wait nineteen minutes at the next station for a bus? In the business world, we’d call that a massive scheduling inefficiency.”

Across the vestibule, a thirty-something respiratory therapist in Tidewater Health scrubs with a stethoscope around her neck looked up from her phone.

“We’re only riding it one stop because suburban politicians spent thirty years blocking this light-rail line from crossing Newtown Road into Virginia Beach to reach the hospital and the community college,” she told him flatly. “And we wait nineteen minutes at Newtown Road Station because Washington cut transit operating aid. By the way, Governor—since that lady on the first bus had to pay your fare, do you even know what a single bus ride costs without looking at the sign?”

Caldwell hesitated, caught without a briefing card. “A single ride—what, ten or twelve dollars depending on the zone?”

Two commuters by the rear doors laughed out loud as the train glided into Newtown Road Station, while behind my shoulder Sam, Mandy, and Sarah exchanged a quiet glance.

During our nineteen-minute wait at the Newtown Road Station bus loop, Caldwell paced back and forth beside the brick shelter checking his gold wristwatch four separate times. When the ten o’clock outbound CVTA Route 25 coach pulled in and carried us down Newtown Road and Princess Anne Road toward the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, a twenty-year-old CCHR student in a manual wheelchair asked Caldwell whether he supported Katie’s federal Wheelchair Right-to-Repair bill; Caldwell spent three minutes talking about “protecting medical-device intellectual property incentives” before cutting the student off to ask Sam how much longer the ride to the college took.

When we rolled down the Route 25 ramp at the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus bus loop at ten-twenty-three and Sam reminded him that the inbound Route 12 ran on an hourly headway—meaning our next bus back to Stop #0812 didn’t depart until ten-fifty-three—Caldwell spent almost the entire twenty-nine-minute layover standing twenty feet away from the bus shelter with his phone pressed to his ear, talking to his campaign manager in Chicago while Katie, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and I chatted with the CCHR students waiting on the bench.

On the ten-fifty-three inbound CVTA Route 12 back along Lynnhaven Parkway, Kempsville Road, and Indian River Road, Caldwell barely answered the two retired shipyard electricians who asked him about Social Security, keeping his eyes fixed on the front windshield until I pressed the yellow stop-request strip approaching Military Highway.

At eleven-twenty, the Route 12 driver deployed the ramp right in front of the blue sign at Stop #0812.

As we rolled onto the sidewalk and Caldwell's four aides came hurrying across the Indian River Road crosswalk from the parking lot with his leather binder, the Governor of Illinois beamed as if he had just aced a Sunday morning talk show.

"Well, Senator Prairie, Nate—what a fantastic morning out here with the good people of Virginia Beach!" Caldwell said, shaking Katie's hand and mine warmly. "My political director will follow up with your office tomorrow on the rollout timing for the endorsement!"

"Thank you for riding the loop with us, Governor Caldwell," Katie said politely from her wheelchair, giving nothing away on the sidewalk. "Have a safe flight back to Illinois."

We waited until Caldwell climbed into his black SUV, and then Katie and I—with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah walking right beside our SwiftChairs—turned around the corner onto Indian River Road and wheeled ourselves home to our brick ranch house on Arvin Road.

Inside our house, while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah put a pot of soup on the stove in the kitchen, Katie and I rolled into the living room and parked our wheelchairs facing each other to make our decision privately between the two of us.

"Well, Nate?" Katie asked quietly, looking across at me. "What do you think?"

"He didn't know how a bus farebox works, he guessed a single ride costs twelve dollars, he talked into my camera lens instead of looking a shipyard worker in the eye, and he told a CCHR student in a wheelchair that manufacturer software locks are 'intellectual property incentives,'" I said evenly. "And during the twenty-nine-minute transfer wait at CCHR, he stood twenty feet away on his phone instead of talking to a single student at the shelter."

"He treated the bus and the passengers like an inconvenience he had to endure for two hours to get a press release," Katie agreed, shaking her head slowly. She reached across our armrests and placed her hand over mine. "Are we agreed? No endorsement for Governor Caldwell?"

"Agreed," I said.

Opening the video folder on my MagnaBook Pro, I dragged the two-hour recording from February 9 into our offline archive drive—never to be uploaded—before Katie and I rolled into the dining room to eat lunch with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah.

Part 3: The Second Tuesday on the Loop: Representative Devon Pierce on Routes 15, 800, 25, & 12

Date: 2044-02-16 at 09:10 America/New_York

Tuesday, February 16, 2044, 9:10 AM — Stop #0812, Leg 1 on CVTA Route 15, & Leg 2 on Route 800 (The Surge Light Rail)

“Wait—you mean we’re actually getting on the bus? For two hours?”

At nine-ten on Tuesday morning, February 16, 2044, forty-four-year-old Representative Devon Pierce of California stood on the concrete pad at the northeast corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road with a glossy briefing folder in one hand and a paper cup of espresso in the other, looking up from our two brushed-silver and black SwiftChair power wheelchairs—and from Sam, Mandy, and Sarah standing beside us—to the blue metal sign marked CVTA STOP #0812 — MILITARY HWY & INDIAN RIVER RD (ROUTES 12, 15).

“We thought Military Highway and Indian River Road — #0812 was an office suite in the plaza behind you,” Pierce said, glancing over his shoulder at his press secretary waiting near the crosswalk.

“No office suite, Congressman,” Katie smiled from her wheelchair as the forty-foot blue-and-silver nine-eighteen northbound CVTA Route 15 coach signaled into the right-hand curb lane behind three morning commuters. “Stop #0812 is our home bus stop, and every candidate gets the exact same route with the five of us: we board the nine-eighteen Route 15 right here up to Military Highway Station, ride Route 800—The Surge Light Rail—one stop east to Newtown Road Station, transfer to the ten o’clock Route 25 down to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, wait twenty-nine minutes at the campus bus loop, and catch the ten-fifty-three inbound Route 12 back along Indian River Road to Stop #0812. Your press secretary stays here, and every passenger and operator on board is invited to ask you questions.”

Pierce stared at the approaching bus for a second, then looked down at my mPhone clipped to the top bezel of my MagnaBook Pro. Suddenly, a wide grin spread across his face.

“I love it! Working-class transit with the folks who build America!” Pierce declared, tossing his espresso cup into the curbside trash can, handing his briefing folder back to his press secretary, and unbuttoning the top two buttons of his dress shirt under his tailored charcoal jacket as the Route 15 bus kneeled at the curb. “Let’s roll, Senator!”

Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: ramp is deploying!

After Katie and I rolled up the aluminum ramp, greeted Darnell at the wheel, tapped our passes, and backed our wheelchairs into the opposing front ADA securement bays while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah tapped their passes and took the row of seats behind my chair, Pierce stepped aboard, fed a five-dollar bill into the farebox without asking for the fifty cents difference on the four-dollar-and-fifty-cent 1-Day GoPass, and took a seat on the perimeter bench across from us.

As the bus pulled away from Stop #0812 and accelerated north up Military Highway, Katie turned her head toward the center aisle and introduced him with the same open warmth she gave every contender.

“Good morning, everybody on the nine-eighteen northbound Route 15!” Katie called out clearly. “This is Congressman Devon Pierce of California, and he’s running for President of the United States. He’s riding with Nate, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me up to Military Highway Station, over on The Surge to Newtown Road, down Route 25 to CCHR, and back on the Route 12 to ask for my endorsement. Nobody gave him any questions in advance—so if you have a question for somebody who wants to be your next President, raise your hand and ask away!”

Two rows behind the front wheel well, a sixty-two-year-old retired shipyard machinist named Mr. Henderson—wearing a navy windbreaker with a Veteran’s Medical Center appointment slip in his breast pocket—raised his hand.

“Congressman,” Mr. Henderson said, “I put in thirty-six years as a marine machinist down at the shipyard before my knees gave out. Every few years somebody in Washington proposes switching the Social Security and federal retirement cost-of-living formula to the chained consumer price index, which cuts thousands of dollars out of a retiree’s check over ten years. Where do you stand on that?”

Instead of answering from his seat, Pierce stood up in the moving aisle, walked two steps back to Mr. Henderson’s row, dropped onto one knee beside the aisle seat, and turned his face three-quarters of the way back toward the front of the bus so he was looking straight into the lens of my mPhone rather than at Mr. Henderson.

“Folks, look at the calluses on this working man’s hands!” Pierce boomed toward my camera, gesturing at Mr. Henderson’s knuckles set on the armrest. “When I look into the eyes of a Virginia shipyard patriot like you, sir, I see my own grandfather’s lunchpail—”

“Son,” Mr. Henderson interrupted calmly, pulling his hand back onto his lap, “you aren’t looking into my eyes. You’re looking at the phone on that young man’s laptop up front. Sit down before the driver hits the brakes for the interstate ramp, and tell me whether you’re voting for or against the chained-CPI cut.”

In the row behind me, Sarah hid a quiet cough behind her hand as Pierce’s smile flickered. Standing back up as Darnell braked for the red light at Corporate Boulevard, Pierce stepped quickly back to the front perimeter bench.

“I oppose any reduction in promised retirement benefits, sir,” Pierce said, smoothing his jacket lapels before glancing at my camera lens again.

At nine-thirty-one, Darnell pulled the Route 15 bus into the transit loop at Military Highway Station. We rolled down the ramp and up the sloped concrete walkway with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah onto the covered island platform for Leg 2: CVTA Route 800, The Surge Light Rail.

Two minutes later, the silver-and-blue two-car electric train glided up to the level boarding strip. Katie and I rolled straight through the wide sliding doors into the vestibule mobility bay with the triplets right beside us and locked our brakes as the doors chimed shut for the three-minute, one-stop ride eastbound to Newtown Road Station.

We had barely cleared the station platform when Pierce reached into his jacket pocket, pulled out his own mPhone, switched the screen to the front-facing selfie camera, and stepped directly behind the gap between Katie's wheelchair and mine—leaning down between our shoulders with a thumbs-up grin to snap a photo of himself with our two wheelchairs without asking either of us.

Katie didn't raise her voice, and she didn't turn her head.

"Put your phone in your pocket, Congressman," Katie said evenly over the quiet hum of the electric traction motors. "Our wheelchairs are how my brother and I move through the world. They are not props for your campaign feed."

Across the vestibule, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and four morning commuters watched in silence as Pierce lowered his arm, clicked his screen off, and slipped the phone back into his coat pocket just as the train glided into Newtown Road Station.

Tuesday, February 16, 2044, 9:58 AM — Leg 3 on CVTA Route 25 to CCHR, Leg 4 on Route 12, & Our Decision at Home on Arvin Road

After waiting out the nineteen-minute transfer window at the Newtown Road Station bus loop, we rolled up the front ramp of the ten o'clock outbound CVTA Route 25 coach—GLENROCK / NEWTOWN RD STATION / CCHR VIRGINIA BEACH / PRINCESS ANNE HOSPITAL—and clicked our floor straps tight while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah took the bench behind us for the twenty-three-minute run down Newtown Road and Princess Anne Road toward the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus.

Seated across the aisle just behind the front wheel housing were two siblings who rode Route 25 to campus every Tuesday and Thursday morning: twenty-two-year-old Jasmine, wearing her royal-blue CCHR Nursing polo shirt, and her nineteen-year-old brother Marcus, a sophomore CCHR computer-science student whose collapsible manual wheelchair was fitted with a clamping power-assist joystick mount very much like the backup chairs our dad had bought Katie and me after Hurricane Isabel.

As the bus turned onto Princess Anne Road, Katie smiled down the aisle and introduced Pierce to the Route 25 riders, inviting anyone on board to ask him a question before we reached the college.

Marcus raised his left hand clearly.

"Congressman Pierce," Marcus said, his voice steady over the hum of the air conditioning, "when the control module on my wheelchair joystick shorted out last semester, the manufacturer refused to sell the replacement part to our local repair shop here in Virginia Beach and locked the diagnostic calibration behind a proprietary dealer code, leaving me waiting eleven weeks for a five-minute repair. And when I finish my software engineering degree next year, if I save more than two thousand dollars in the bank, federal SSI and Medicaid rules threaten to strip the home-care waiver I use every morning. Will you sign Senator Prairie's Wheelchair Right-to-Repair Act and her SSI Asset Cap Elimination Act?"

Pierce stood up from the perimeter bench with a broad, sympathetic smile, stepped over to their row, patted Marcus once on the shoulder, and looked right over the top of Marcus's head to speak directly to his able-bodied sister Jasmine—while angling his torso back toward my camera.

"First of all, young lady, let me just say how deeply inspiring it is that you bring your brother to campus with you every morning so he can be around the college environment," Pierce said in a loud, warm stage voice addressed entirely to Jasmine. "Caregivers like you are the unsung angels of our healthcare system. What's your brother's name, sweetheart, and how long have you been taking care of him?"

Inside the front half of CVTA Route 25, every conversation stopped dead.

Across from me, Katie sat perfectly still in her SwiftChair, while behind my shoulder Sam, Mandy, and Sarah stiffened in unison.

Jasmine didn't say a word. Keeping her hands folded calmly in her lap on the blue vinyl bus seat, she pointed her right index finger six inches to her side—straight at her brother.

Marcus looked up at the forty-four-year-old Congressman with a level, matter-of-fact expression.

"My name is Marcus, Congressman," Marcus said clearly into the quiet bus. "I'm a second-year computer-science major at CCHR with a three-point-nine GPA, my sister isn't 'bringing me around the college environment,' and I asked you the question myself. Why are you talking to my sister over my head like I can't speak?"

Pierce froze in the center aisle, his mouth opening slightly as he looked down at Marcus, then at Jasmine, and then back at Katie, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me.

"I—of course, Marcus, I was just—I was acknowledging your family's support network," Pierce stammered, his face flushing red as he backed awkwardly into his perimeter seat. "On the—on the repair question, I strongly support bringing medical-device innovators and consumer advocates to the table to streamline warranty turnarounds…"

At ten-twenty-three, the Route 25 coach pulled into the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus transit loop on College Crescent. As Marcus and Jasmine rolled down the ramp ahead of us toward the Science and Technology building, Katie called out warmly, "Good luck on your data-structures midterm, Marcus! See you Thursday, Jasmine!"

"Thanks, Senator Prairie! See you Thursday, Nate!" Marcus called back over his shoulder.

During our twenty-nine-minute transfer wait at the CCHR campus shelter before the ten-fifty-three inbound CVTA Route 12 arrived, Pierce paced back and forth beside the bike racks in the chilly breeze, walking over twice to ask me whether I edited the videos before posting them.

“We don’t edit anything, Congressman,” I told him politely.

On the twenty-seven-minute inbound Route 12 ride back along Lynnhaven Parkway, Kempsville Road, and Indian River Road, Pierce stayed seated quietly on the perimeter bench, answering a retired postal clerk’s question about prescription drug prices in two short sentences before looking out the window the rest of the way to Military Highway.

When the Route 12 ramp deployed back at Stop #0812 at eleven-twenty, Pierce shook Katie’s hand and mine on the sidewalk.

“Senator, Nate—thank you for taking me out on the routes today,” Pierce said earnestly. “I hope you know my heart is in the right place for working families and the disability community, and I’d be honored to have your support.”

“Thank you for riding the loop with us, Congressman,” Katie replied evenly. “Have a safe flight back to California.”

Once Pierce walked across the Indian River Road crosswalk to meet his press secretary, Katie and I—with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah walking right beside us—turned our SwiftChairs down the sidewalk from our home bus stop and wheeled ourselves back around the corner to our house on Arvin Road.

While Sam, Mandy, and Sarah set out sandwiches in the dining room, Katie and I parked our wheelchairs side by side in the living room to talk over the interview quietly between the two of us.

“He looked right over Marcus’s head and asked Jasmine what his name was,” Katie said softly, her voice tight with the shared memory of every stranger who had ever patted our heads or talked over our wheelchairs to Dad when we were growing up. “And on The Surge, he tried to take a selfie with our chairs without even asking us.”

“And on Route 15, he knelt in the aisle and talked to my camera lens instead of looking Mr. Henderson in the eye,” I added. “Are we agreed on Congressman Pierce?”

“We’re agreed,” Katie nodded firmly. “No endorsement.”

I moved the February 16 video file into our offline archive drive and closed my laptop lid. Only one appointment remained on our calendar for Thursday morning at nine-ten: Governor Elena Delgado of Michigan.

Part 4: The Thursday Morning Loop: Governor Elena Delgado & The Six O’Clock Upload

Date: 2044-02-18 at 09:10 America/New_York

Thursday, February 18, 2044, 9:10 AM — Stop #0812 & Leg 1 Aboard CVTA Route 15 to Military Highway Station

“Good morning, Senator Prairie! Good morning, Nate! Good morning, everyone! Are we meeting in the corner office behind the dry cleaner, or is the entrance around back?”

At ten minutes past nine on a crisp, forty-six-degree Thursday morning—February 18, 2044—fifty-four-year-old Governor Elena Delgado of Michigan stepped onto the concrete sidewalk at the northeast corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road wearing a sensible navy wool peacoat, flat walking shoes, and a knit scarf, carrying a black leather briefing binder tucked under one arm and a worn canvas tote bag over her shoulder as she greeted Katie, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me.

"Neither one, Governor Delgado," fifty-eight-year-old Katie smiled from her SwiftChair, reaching up to tap the blue-and-white metal bus stop sign bolted to the pole beside her wheel: CVTA STOP #0812 — MILITARY HWY & INDIAN RIVER RD (ROUTES 12, 15). "This is Marker #0812—Nate's and my home bus stop. Our nine-eighteen northbound Route 15 bus is pulling up to the signal right now. The five of us are riding the 15 with you up to Military Highway Station, taking Route 800—The Surge Light Rail—one stop to Newtown Road Station, catching the ten o'clock Route 25 down to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus, waiting twenty-nine minutes at the campus bus loop, and transferring to the ten-fifty-three Route 12 back here to Stop #0812. You have the length of that trip to ask for my endorsement, your chief of staff stays here, and every passenger on the buses and the train is invited to ask you questions."

For two full seconds, Elena Delgado stood motionless on the Virginia Beach sidewalk, looking from the blue metal bus stop pole to our two wheelchairs, to Sam, Mandy, and Sarah, and then down Military Highway at the forty-foot blue-and-silver CVTA Route 15 coach signaling into the right-hand curb lane behind a postal worker and two hospital aides.

Then, right there on the corner of Military Highway and Indian River Road, she threw her head back and laughed—a warm, genuine, delighted laugh that made all five of us smile.

"A two-hour city bus and light-rail loop with the regular morning riders instead of a stuffy conference room?" Delgado grinned, turning on her heel to hand her thick leather briefing binder straight back to her wide-eyed chief of staff waiting at the edge of the crosswalk. "Hold my binder, Carla, and go grab yourself some breakfast—I won't need talking points where we're going! Tell the hotel I'll be back around noon!"

Turning back toward the curb as the Route 15 bus hissed to a stop and kneeled its front air suspension, Delgado unsnapped her wallet inside her canvas tote bag, pulled out four one-dollar bills and two quarters, and stepped aside so the postal worker, the hospital aides, our two wheelchairs, and Sam, Mandy, and Sarah could board ahead of her.

Caution: bus is kneeling! Caution: ramp is deploying!

Our driver Darnell raised both eyebrows when he saw the Governor of Michigan step up to his farebox behind our group, feed four singles and two quarters cleanly into the slot for a four-dollar-and-fifty-cent 1-Day CVTA GoPass card, and say, "Good morning, sir—thank you for driving."

Once Katie and I backed our SwiftChairs into the two opposing front ADA securement bays and clicked our SafeLock floor straps tight while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah took the row of seats immediately behind my wheelchair, Katie looked down the center aisle as the bus pulled away from Stop #0812 and accelerated north up Military Highway toward the Interstate 264 interchange.

“Good morning, everybody on the nine-eighteen northbound Route 15!” Katie called out warmly. “This is Governor Elena Delgado of Michigan, and she’s running for President of the United States. She’s riding with Nate, Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and me up to Military Highway Station, over on The Surge to Newtown Road, down Route 25 to CCHR, and back on the Route 12 to ask for my endorsement. Nobody gave her any questions in advance—so if you have a question for somebody who wants to be your next President, raise your hand and ask away!”

Halfway down the bus, a forty-five-year-old marine pipefitter in a heavy canvas jacket with a shipyard badge clipped to his collar raised his hand before we even passed Elizabeth River Way.

“I’ll go first, Senator!” the pipefitter called out over the diesel hum as Governor Delgado sat down in the sideways perimeter seat across from our wheelchairs, tucked her canvas tote bag between her flat shoes, and turned to look directly at the pipefitter—never once glancing at the mPhone mounted on my MagnaBook Pro. “Governor, my wife works at Lake Taylor Transitional Care Hospital and I work the early shift in the yards. Back in twenty-seven, Garrett Thorne and Bret Halverson treated defense workers and sailors in Hampton Roads like stage props while steering four hundred million dollars to offshore shell companies—and then corporate Democrats come down here and talk about cutting transit operating aid to balance the budget. If you’re President, what happens to the shipyard workforce and the buses my wife rides to the hospital?”

Leaning forward with her hands clasped loosely over her knees as the bus rolled past the car dealerships on Military Highway, Delgado answered him directly:

“First, not a single shipyard contract leaves public accountability on my watch—every dollar of Navy fleet maintenance and submarine construction stays tied to union prevailing-wage standards and domestic audit trails like the ones Senator Prairie and Nate wrote into the 2028 Defense Logistics Transparency Act,” Delgado said clearly. “And second, a bus without a driver and fuel is just a paperweight. For forty years Washington loved cutting ribbons on capital projects while starving local transit agencies of the day-to-day operating money required to pay operators like our driver up front and run buses every fifteen minutes instead of once an hour. If Senator Prairie puts the Universal Transit Operating Partnership Act on my desk in the Oval Office, I’ll sign it the same afternoon.”

Up in the driver’s seat, Darnell tapped his horn button once in approval and called back over his shoulder in the rearview mirror, “Tell her to put overtime tax relief for night-shift bus operators in that bill too, Governor!”

“Sam’s already writing that down in his notebook, Darnell!” Delgado laughed as Sam grinned and jotted the note onto his legal pad in the seat behind me.

Thursday, February 18, 2044, 9:34 AM — Leg 2 on Route 800 (The Surge Light Rail) & Leg 3 on CVTA Route 25 to CCHR

At nine-thirty-one, Darnell pulled the Route 15 bus into the transit loop beside the interstate embankment at Military Highway Station, kneeled the suspension, and deployed the front ramp.

“Thank you, Darnell!” Katie and I called out as we rolled off the ramp with Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and Governor Delgado walking right beside us up the gently sloped concrete access ramp onto the covered center island platform of CVTA Route 800: The Surge Light Rail.

Two minutes later, the dual overhead catenary wires hummed, a bell chimed twice, and a sleek silver-and-blue articulated two-car light-rail train glided to a smooth halt along the level boarding tactile strip with its amber destination display reading 800 THE SURGE — NEWTOWN ROAD STATION.

Because the platform height matched the train floor to the millimeter, Katie and I rolled straight through the wide double sliding doors without needing a lift or ramp, locking our SwiftChair brakes in the open mobility bay just inside the vestibule as Sam, Mandy, Sarah, and Delgado stepped aboard and the electric traction motors hummed eastbound along the rail right-of-way.

Standing by the window handhold beside Mandy and Sarah, Elena Delgado looked south across the interstate sound wall toward the Norfolk–Virginia Beach city line.

“Look out that window, Elena,” Katie said as the train glided smoothly at forty-five miles an hour. “This light-rail line opened in 2011 and stops dead right here at Newtown Road on the city line because for decades suburban politicians used coded fearmongering about ‘who rides public transit’ to block regional rail from crossing into Virginia Beach cleanly. Every time a working mother or a wheelchair user has to get from Norfolk to the community college or the hospital in Virginia Beach, they have to roll off this train at Newtown Road Station and wait in the weather for an hourly bus.”

Sitting across from our chairs in the vestibule, a twenty-nine-year-old paralegal in a trench coat nodded vigorously.

“I do this transfer every morning, Governor,” the paralegal chimed in. “Three minutes on the train, and then if the Route 25 or Route 27 is running late, you’re standing in the wind for forty minutes.”

“We fought the exact same regional transit boundary wars between Detroit, Oakland County, and Macomb County in Michigan,” Delgado answered, looking directly at the paralegal as the train eased into the concrete platform at Newtown Road Station. “When I’m President, Federal Transit Administration New Starts and Small Starts capital matching grants are going to carry a statutory anti-balkanization bonus: municipalities that tear down artificial city-line transfer walls and run seamless, high-frequency cross-border rail and bus rapid transit get an eighty-five-percent federal match.”

Stepping off The Surge at Newtown Road Station at nine-forty-one, we rolled across the brick bus loop to the Route 25 shelter for our nineteen-minute transfer wait.

Delgado sat right down on the perforated metal bus bench beside our two SwiftChairs and the triplets, pulled a small spiral notebook out of her canvas tote bag, and spent all nineteen minutes talking with a retired Navy hull technician waiting for the bus and asking Sarah and me how our PHP and SQL accessibility auditing scripts tested federal agency websites for screen-reader and keyboard-navigation compliance.

At nine-fifty-eight, the forty-foot CVTA Route 25 coach—GLENROCK / NEWTOWN RD STATION / CCHR VIRGINIA BEACH / PRINCESS ANNE HOSPITAL—pulled into the bay and kneeled.

Because CVTA had zero advance notice that we were riding, the bus that pulled up on Route 25 was a twelve-year-old coach whose hydraulic front wheelchair ramp gave a stubborn metallic click halfway out and stalled two inches above the concrete curb.

While the operator—a veteran driver named Terrance—flipped the ramp reset switch to cycle the hydraulic arm a second time, Delgado stepped smoothly to the side of the open front doorway beside Sam to block the cold crosswind for an elderly woman seated near the farebox until the ramp settled flat against the concrete on the second cycle and Katie and I rolled aboard.

Sitting right across the aisle behind the front wheel well—on their regular Tuesday-Thursday morning commute to the Community College of Hampton Roads Virginia Beach Campus—were twenty-two-year-old Jasmine in her royal-blue CCHR Nursing polo shirt and her nineteen-year-old brother Marcus in his manual wheelchair with its clamping power-assist joystick attachment.

When Katie introduced Governor Delgado to the Route 25 riders and invited questions as the bus turned onto Princess Anne Road, Marcus raised his hand.

“Governor Delgado,” Marcus said clearly, “when the controller module on my wheelchair joystick broke last autumn, the manufacturer locked the diagnostic software behind a proprietary dealer code and made me wait eleven weeks for a five-minute repair—and if I earn more than two thousand dollars in my summer software-engineering internship, Medicaid and SSI threaten to cut off my home-and-community-based personal-care waiver. What are you going to do about both of those?”

Delgado stayed seated on the perimeter bench across the aisle so she was looking straight into Marcus’s eyes on a level plane, speaking directly to him.

“Marcus, locking a person’s mobility hardware behind proprietary software DRM so an independent repair shop in Virginia Beach can’t swap out a controller module should be illegal under federal law,” Delgado said, her voice steady and clear. “Senator Prairie and Nate have been fighting the durable-medical-equipment lobby for six years to pass the National Wheelchair Right-to-Repair and 48-Hour Loaner Mandate Act. As President, I won’t even wait for the lobbyists to stall in committee: on Day One, my Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services Administrator will issue a binding national procurement rule prohibiting Medicare and Medicaid from reimbursing any wheelchair manufacturer that refuses to provide open diagnostic codes, schematics, and at-cost replacement parts to wheelchair users and independent repair techs.”

Marcus's eyebrows went up, and beside him, Jasmine smiled warmly.

"And on your second question," Delgado continued, keeping her eyes locked with Marcus's as the Route 25 bus crossed Lynnhaven Parkway toward the CCHR campus, "forcing disabled Americans to stay trapped in enforced poverty with less than two thousand dollars in the bank just to keep the Medicaid personal-care waivers or SSI benefits you need to get dressed and go to work is cruel and backwards. When Jasmine finishes her nursing degree and you finish your software engineering degree, you should be able to take that internship, save for a home, and get married one day without ever losing a single hour of your personal-care waiver. Send me Senator Prairie's SSI and Medicaid Waiver Freedom to Work and Marry Act, and I will sign it."

"Thank you, Governor," Marcus said, nodding as the front half of the Route 25 bus applauded. "That's the first straight answer I've heard all week."

Thursday, February 18, 2044, 10:53 AM — Leg 4 on Route 12 Back to Stop #0812, Our Decision at Home on Arvin Road, & The Quiet Upload

At ten-twenty-three, the Route 25 coach pulled into the CCHR Virginia Beach Campus transit loop on College Crescent.

Because CVTA Route 12 (South Norfolk / CCHR Virginia Beach) operated on a sixty-minute headway, the next inbound Route 12 bus back toward Military Highway and Indian River Road wasn't scheduled to depart the campus loop until ten-fifty-three—twenty-nine minutes away.

Walking inside the student center lobby with Mandy and Sarah, Elena Delgado bought six bags of salted pretzels and six bottles of cold ginger ale from the vending machines with her own dollar bills and came right back outside to the CCHR bus shelter. For the next twenty-five minutes, sitting on the bench beside our two SwiftChairs and the triplets with a pretzel in her hand while students walked past between classes, she asked Katie and me about our 2003–2005 classes in the Information Systems lab across the quad, listened to how our dad had gone back to college right here at CCHR after seeing our seventh-grade HTML homework at Morrison Middle School, and chatted with a fifty-year-old custodial worker waiting for the ten-fifty-three bus.

At ten-fifty-three on the dot, all six of us boarded the inbound CVTA Route 12 coach and rode the final twenty-seven minutes west along Princess Anne Road, up Lynnhaven Parkway and Kempsville Road, and onto Indian River Road—where Delgado fielded three more unscripted questions from a preschool teacher, a retired Navy electrician, and a grocery clerk before I reached up from my SwiftChair and pressed the yellow stop-request strip just past Kempsville Plaza.

At eleven-twenty, the Route 12 bus pulled to the curb right in front of the blue metal sign at Stop #0812 at Military Highway and Indian River Road, completing our two-hour-and-two-minute four-seat circle.

As we rolled down the front ramp onto the concrete sidewalk with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah and the Route 12 bus merged back into traffic, Elena Delgado shook Katie's hand, mine, and each of the triplets' hands warmly.

“Thank you all for taking me on your loop today,” Delgado said as she spotted her chief of staff Carla walking over from the coffee shop across the intersection with her leather binder. “Whatever you decide, those two hours on the 15, The Surge, the 25, and the 12—and meeting Marcus and Jasmine at CCHR—were the best two hours I’ve spent on this entire campaign.”

“Thank you for riding with us, Elena,” Katie smiled from her wheelchair, giving nothing away on the sidewalk. “Have a safe flight back to Michigan.”

Once Elena Delgado and her chief of staff walked back across the crosswalk toward their sedan, Katie and I—with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah walking alongside our SwiftChairs—turned down the sidewalk from Stop #0812, rounded the corner onto Indian River Road, and wheeled ourselves home to our brick ranch house on Arvin Road.

Inside, while Sam, Mandy, and Sarah toasted grilled cheese sandwiches and heated tomato soup in the kitchen, Katie and I rolled into the living room and parked our wheelchairs facing each other to make our decision quietly between the two of us.

“Well, Nate?” Katie asked softly. “What do you think?”

“She handed her briefing binder back to her chief of staff without blinking, paid her own four-dollar-and-fifty-cent fare at the box, stood beside Sam to block the cold wind for an older passenger while Terrance cycled the sticky ramp on Route 25, and looked Marcus straight in the eye as an equal,” I said, smiling across at my twin sister. “And she never once looked at my camera lens the entire two hours.”

“Not once,” Katie beamed, her blue eyes shining as she reached across our armrests to lace her fingers through mine. “She’s the one, Nate. Are we agreed?”

“One hundred percent agreed,” I said.

When we rolled into the dining room and told Sam, Mandy, and Sarah what the two of us had decided, all three triplets broke into wide grins around the table.

We didn’t call a press conference, we didn’t send a media advisory to the cable networks, and we didn’t even call Elena Delgado’s campaign manager to give them a heads-up.

Instead, sitting right there beside Katie at our dining room table on Arvin Road with Sam, Mandy, and Sarah watching over our shoulders, I transferred the raw, unedited two-hour-and-two-minute video file from my mPhone onto my MagnaBook Pro, logged into our channel on StreamCast, The Grid, and Chirp, and quietly uploaded the entire bus ride with zero fanfare—typing a single plain-text video title so that the title itself told the world who Katie was endorsing for President of the United States:

Why I Am Endorsing Elena Delgado for President of the United States — A Two-Hour Ride on CVTA Routes 15, 800 (The Surge), 25, & 12 from Stop #0812

Katie leaned her wheelchair in beside mine, rested her cheek against my shoulder, and watched as I clicked Publish.